DISTINGUISHED VISITORS IN GALLERY

CHIEF OF JACKHEAD INDIAN RESERVE, MANITOBA

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I would like to draw the attention of the Senate to the presence in the Senate Gallery of Chief William Travers, who is Chief of the Jackhead Indian Reserve, which is on the western shore of the northern basin of the ninth largest freshwater lake in the world, Lake Winnipeg, which is in Manitoba.

Chief Travers is the immediate past leader of the Indian Brotherhood of First Nations and the immediate past leader of the Interlake Tribal Group. During his tenure as Chief of the Jackhead Indian Reserve, he was responsible for a great deal of social progress in his community, thus bettering life for his people. His achievements include bringing hydro power to the reserve, upgrading educational resources and improving the fiscal responsibility of the reserve.

Chief Travers is accompanied by Mr. Ian Restall, who is a Professor of Law at the University of Manitoba and a legal practitioner with the firm of Swystun and Associates of Winnipeg.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

1987 CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—MESSAGE FROM HOUSE OF COMMONS—MOTION TO CONCUR—DEBATE ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following message had been received from the House of Commons:

HOUSE OF COMMONS CANADA

Tuesday, June 16, 1987

ORDERED,—That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and of the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report on the "1987 Constitutional Accord, signed in Ottawa on June 3, 1987, by the First Ministers of Canada", copies of which were tabled in the Senate and the House of Commons on June 3, 1987;

That the Committee have the power to appoint from among its Members such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the House;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the House of Commons;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the quorum of the Committee be eight Members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented, and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six Members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting that House to unite with this House for the above purpose, and to select, if the Senate deems it to be advisable, five Members to act on the proposed Special Joint Committee.

ATTEST

Michael B. Kirby
for The Clerk of the House of Commons

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this message be taken into consideration?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(d), now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(d), I move:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consider and report on the "1987 Constitutional Accord, signed in Ottawa on June 3, 1987, by the First Ministers of Canada", copies of which were tabled in the Senate and the House of Commons on June 3, 1987.

That twelve Members of the House of Commons and five Members of the Senate be the Members of the Special Joint Committee, such Members on the part of the Senate to be designated no later than seven sitting days after the adoption of this motion;

That the Committee have the power to appoint from among its Members such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such sub-committees

all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings or of proceedings of its sub-committees, pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons;

That the Committee submit its report not later than September 14, 1987, provided that, if the Senate is not sitting, the report will be deemed submitted on the day such report is deposited with the Clerk of the Senate;

That substitution be authorized, for Members from the House of Commons, from a list of alternates to be provided to the Joint Chairmen of the Special Joint Committee by a representative of each party at the first meeting of the Committee, such list of alternates to contain no more than twice the number of Members of the House of Commons who are Members of the Special Joint Committee representing each party in the House;

That the quorum of the Committee be eight Members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented, and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six Members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): No, it is not.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, today's motion is almost anti-climactic. Honourable senators knew it was coming. The government had announced its intention in this regard some time ago. I had conveyed that information to honourable senators. Notwithstanding that fact, honourable senators, in a majority, voted the other day to refer the matters under discussion to a Committee of the Whole of the Senate.

Honourable senators opposite, however, took the position, if I understood the Leader of the Opposition correctly, that referring the Constitutional Accord to Committee of the Whole did not prejudice the position they might take on an invitation from the House of Commons to join with that House in a joint committee. Members of the other place were, and are, well aware of the decision that was taken, for whatever reason, by a majority of members of this place. Notwithstanding that, they proceeded this morning unanimously in the other place to pass the motion with which we are now seized, inviting us to join in this joint committee.

The terms under which it is proposed to set up the committee are unexceptional. The number of senators and members of the House of Commons is a total of 17—12 members of the House of Commons and 5 members of this place. That is the same number in each case as constituted the membership of the special committee that studied Canadian foreign policy earlier in the present Parliament.

I can only appeal to honourable senators for their support of this motion. It asks the Senate to participate in the joint committee. I believe that that will, first of all, meet the convenience of many witnesses who wish to take advantage of this process. I believe that whatever the Committee of the Whole of the Senate may wish to do with the accord, the establishment of a joint committee will make for a better organized, more coherent and more efficient consideration of this important matter.

Finally, I express the hope that in the circumstances, and notwithstanding the decision that a majority of honourable senators took on Thursday last, honourable senators would not place the Senate in the position of refusing an invitation of this kind from the other place. That, I believe, would constitute a very undesirable parliamentary precedent.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, to pick up exactly where the Leader of the Government left off, for reasons that I think honourable senators will understand, I believe that to support and concur in this motion would be a very bad constitutional precedent. It would not at all create a bad precedent for the Senate to refuse to join with the House of Commons on this resolution for a joint committee.

I want to make it clear that I am speaking to senators, that I am speaking as a senator, that I am not speaking as a Liberal or as the Deputy Leader of the Opposition—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Phillips: That's new!

Senator Frith: —or as a Conservative—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: —or as an Independent, or any of the above. I am speaking as a senator, and I am speaking to all of you not as Liberals, not as Conservatives, not as Independents, but as senators.

Before I explain why I believe it would be a very bad precedent for the Senate to concur in this motion, let me deal with the feelings that were behind the groans, the "ohs" and the "ahs" we heard from the other side a few moments ago, and that is to try to avoid—though it may be hopeless to do so—any one of my colleagues in the Senate or members of the House of Commons or members of the press putting a mischievous spin on what I am about to say. Let me come to grips with that immediately.

This is not a challenge to my colleagues, who may very well vote in favour of this motion; this is not a challenge to the leadership of Mr. Turner; this is not a challenge to the leadership in the Senate. If it is a challenge at all, it is a challenge to the House of Commons, and a respectful one, of course.

Why do I think we should not have a joint committee? Well, let us look at why people say we should have a joint committee. People say we should have a joint committee because we had one in 1981 and 1982. They say we can have both a Senate committee and a joint committee because we had that in 1978. So, let us go back to 1981, 1982 and 1978 to understand why I say we should not have a joint committee.

In the Fulton-Favreau report there was a useful and, I believe, scholarly and generally accepted review of the amending process that had taken place up to 1981-82. It reviews all of the cases of amendments, and points out that there was a great deal of variety in the amending procedures used in the sense that in some cases all of the provinces were consulted, and in some cases they were not. In some other cases only provinces affected were concerned.

The first one reviewed is the British North America Act of 1871. It goes through all of them up to the time of the British North America Act of 1960, and then tries to draw general principles from the amending procedure.

Remember, honourable senators, that at that time the Constitution was amended by the Parliament of the United Kingdom; it was not amended in Canada. In every one of the cases that I have mentioned, the amendment was done in London.

The authors then draw some of the conclusions that can be drawn from those years of experience. They state:

The first general principle that emerges in the foregoing resumé is that although an enactment by the United Kingdom is necessary to amend the British North America Act, such action is taken only upon formal request from Canada. No act of the United Kingdom Parliament affecting Canada is therefore passed unless it is requested and consented to by Canada. Conversely, every amendment requested by Canada in the past has been enacted.

The second general principle is that the sanction of Parliament is required for a request to the British Parliament for an amendment to the British North America Act. This principle was established early in the history of Canada's constitutional amendments, and has not been violated since 1895. The procedure invariably is to ask amendments by a joint Address of the Canadian House of Commons and Senate to the Crown.

I emphasize "joint address".

So, in 1978 the existence of a joint committee was quite consistent with precedents to that date, because on Bill C-60 it would have required a joint address for the amendment.

In 1982, when the present amending formula was established, the method used was a joint address, that is to say, it was effected by a joint address of the Senate and the House of Commons. We also had a joint committee for our joint address. But under the present amending formula, which, incidentally, was passed by the House of Commons, the House of Commons has sent us this request to join with them in a joint committee. Then, together with the necessary provinces, it is sought to have the amendment take place by resolution of the Senate, not by a joint address. The amending formula requires a resolution of the Senate, a resolution of the House of Commons, and a resolution of the necessary number of provinces.

So, the process that is now in place is not a joint address by the Parliament of Canada, it is a series of resolutions by the Senate, by the House of Commons and the necessary number of provinces, each of which has its own individual resolution. I assume, for example, that Ontario and Quebec, or Ontario and Manitoba, will decide not to have a joint committee to look after their responsibilities, which are separate and not joint.

Honourable senators, we now have, with that method in place, the suggestion that we should proceed by joint committee to investigate and carry out our separate functions.

It is said—and I believe that there is support for this—that when the Constitution was amended to set up the present formula, and when section 47 was passed, which is the section which provides that the Senate can be bypassed in constitutional amendments, and that 180 days after the House of Commons passes its resolution—not a joint resolution, but its own resolution; another evidence of the separation of the Senate and the House of Commons with separate functions to perform—and the House of Commons passes it again, it can then take effect by proclamation, without the intervention of the Senate.

Again the Senate was given a different role. It has been said that the reason it was given a separate role in the section that provides for resolutions was related to the fact that it now has a separate timetable and was asked to take only a suspensive veto. That is another reason to consider our responsibilities as being separate.

What is before us now is one of the other partners in the amending process, namely, the House of Commons—and it could as easily be the Province of Ontario or one of our other partners in the process—I suppose because of what seems to me to be the House's rear view mirror approach, not having really read the Constitution, not having thought about the fact that there is a different process, and thinking that we have always had a joint committee, and that there is no reason to have another one now—asking us to join with them in a joint committee with unequal representation. Do they have that in mind? If they were to stop looking in their rear view mirror of pre-1981-1982, and if they were to look at the present proceedings, why would they be asking us to join in a committee on which they, the House of Commons, will have a majority? You have heard what was read.

If they have read the Constitution, do they mean to say, "We know that you, as senators, have a separate responsibility and a separate timetable, but we want your process to be governed by a committee on which we have the majority." Why would they want to do that, unless they wanted to control totally the carrying out of our responsibilities, that is, the responsibility that each one of us has constitutionally as a senator to approach this matter with our own separate, distinct responsibility? It can only be because the House of Commons wants to run the show. If that is the way they want it, they should have said that in 1982. They should have said, "No, we are not going to give the Senate a separate responsibility." They had the chance. They voted for a constitutional amending formula that gave us a separate responsibility. Now they come back to us and say, "Yes, but we still want to run the whole show." Not only do they say they want it to be joint—although they said it was going to be separate, and voted for its being separate—they want to run the whole show, and they want to have a majority.

Honourable senators, I am sure you can see how they would respond if it were the other way around. Suppose that we put forward this resolution and asked them to join, and let us run their show with us having a majority. You can imagine what the response would be.

The NDP said that they could not understand why—one of the reasons they could not understand why is because they never took the time to read the Constitution—senators wanted a separate committee; that it was outrageous that a bunch of hacks, flacks and bagmen were presuming to look after their own constitutional responsibilities. I assume they voted for this motion since I hear it was passed unanimously, but if that is what they think of us, why do they want us to serve on their committee?

I say that we should say to them, "Thanks for asking. Go back and read the Constitution. Look after your responsibility. Let us hope that Ontario, Quebec, Prince Edward Island and all the other provinces will look after their individual responsibility, but we mean to look after ours, and we do not need any help from you. We have already set up our own committee and we will do our job. You will hear from us. Don't call us, we'll call you. You do the same thing, that is, look after your own responsibilities, mind your own business, and let us look after ours."

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I am rising on a point of order. I had intended to do it immediately after Senator Murray's remarks, but Senator Frith had already taken the floor. In the course of his remarks the Honourable Leader of the Government alluded to, commented on and, indeed, reflected upon the vote taken in this house last week on the question of establishing a Committee of the Whole to study the Constitutional Accord. He did so, and I think I am correct in quoting him, by referring to "a decision of a majority" in this house. Besides the point that a decision of a majority in the house is, in fact, a decision of the whole house, I would like to object to Senator Murray's remarks inasmuch as they offend parliamentary practice.

[Senator Frith.]

I quote as my authority Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fifth Edition, page 102, citation 313. This is one of the paragraphs under the heading "Content of Speeches".

A Member may not speak against or reflect upon any determination of the House, unless he intends to conclude with a motion for rescinding it.

Citation 315 on the same page, continuing on to page 103, states:

(1) It is a wholesome restraint upon Members that they cannot revive a debate already concluded; and it would be little use in preventing the same question from being offered twice in the same session if, without being offered, its merits might be discussed again and again.

I particularly draw to the attention of honourable senators the contents of paragraph (2) of citation 315, which states:

(2) It is irregular to reflect upon, argue against, or in any manner call in question in debate the past acts or proceedings of the House, on the obvious ground that, besides tending to revive discussion upon questions which have already been once decided, such reflections are uncourteous to the House and irregular in principle inasmuch as the Member is himself included in and bound by a vote agreed to by a majority; and it seems that, reflecting upon or questioning the acts of the "majority" is equivalent to reflecting upon the House.

Therefore, I humbly request that Senator Murray withdraw his comments, because they are against a long-standing practice and tradition. If other senators wish to comment, I invite them to do so. I find it difficult to accept any other interpretation of the quotations I have just produced.

● (1430)

[Translation]

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, I would like to make a few brief remarks on the comments made earlier by Senator Frith.

I certainly do not challenge his reading and interpretation of the provisions of the Constitution Act of 1982. I agree, and he stressed this very strongly, that it refers to two distinct resolutions and not to a joint resolution of the House of Commons and the Senate, and that this was contrary to previous practice, which is indeed perfectly accurate.

However, I think we should make a distinction between what I would call the final stage of the process, namely where the House of Commons and the Senate are each called upon to assume their separate responsibilities, and the stage at which a question, which may eventually lead to those two separate resolutions, in other words, to a constitutional amendment, is considered and reported. As far as the final stage is concerned, I have no quarrel with Senator Frith's analysis.

The motion before us today says:

That a Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons be appointed to consider and report—

At this stage, we are "considering". I think that the reasons given by Senator Frith for having the Senate decline an invitation from the House of Commons to consider jointly the subject in question are totally unfounded, and it seems to me his objections do not hold water.

In fact, I think that joint consideration, and I apologize for being repetitious, makes perfect sense more than anything else.

If we are to consider the draft constitutional amendment, the June 3 Constitutional Accord, it seems to me it would be in the interests of all concerned, and especially of the witnesses the joint committee might wish to invite, and any witnesses who might wish to be heard, to have this done simultaneously by the Commons and the Senate. I hardly think the Senate would object, if it sits in Committee of the Whole, to hearing witnesses that previously appeared before the Commons and vice versa. And there will surely be witnesses who will want to be heard in both places. So let them have an opportunity to be heard by both chambers simultaneously, instead of by each separately. I think it is just a matter of common sense.

I repeat, and I want to say this in concluding, that this does not in any way affect the distinct responsibilities of the two chambers at the subsequent stage, after consideration, when both chambers will assume their separate responsibilities, without seeing this as a challenge to the other's authority. That is what I had to say about the analysis given by Senator Frith.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, would Senator Tremblay entertain a question?

Senator Tremblay: Yes, honourable senators.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, unless I am mistaken the proposition of Senator Tremblay is as follows: A distinction must be made between the resolution, the final act and the study. If this proposition is true, it includes a corollary.

I would suggest that in the case of a bill, the final act or the final resolution of a bill consists in its adoption on third reading. Why not examine it together at the study stage? It is the corollary of his proposition, is it not?

According to him we would be better advised if we were to act independently to make a final decision, and we should make the study together. The same argument applies with respect to legislation.

But let us consider the process of a constitutional amendment we now have before us. We participate, as do the other partners. All these partners must pass their own resolution. Why did we not strike a joint committee with Ontario, and why not with the 12? All together we could study it, and then we should go our separate ways and make our final decision. That is the difficulty I have with the proposition of Senator Tremblay.

Senator Tremblay: Honourable senators, after the first words of Senator Frith I had the impression he was asking me whether I would accept a question from him. I did not detect a question in what he said. However I thought I detected a brand new suggestion: a proposition to convene all the legislative assemblies so they would undertake together the study in question.

What more can I say about this proposition other than referring to what I said earlier, a kind of common sense.

[English]

Senator Frith: It is called reductio ad absurdum, and it was meant to be!

[Translation]

Hon. Pietro Rizzutto: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. The government is proposing to have twelve members of the other place and five senators on the joint committee. Has there been any thought given to how many of the five senators will be chosen from the government side and how many from this side? Will there be a co-chairman from the Senate? If so, would the joint committee agree to have a senator from this side of the House act as co-chairman?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I have taken down the questions asked by my honourable friend. I shall try to reply to these questions when we are concluding this debate.

Senator Rizzutto: Honourable senators, I have asked these questions because they are extremely important for many of us here today. I believe that the Senate will be very well represented. If we could have a senator from this side of the house as co-chairman, it could help many senators when the time comes for them to decide whether to vote for or against the proposal. If the Senate agrees, I would like to adjourn the debate until tomorrow afternoon.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, we shall follow the normal process. The resolution mentions twelve Members of the House of Commons and five senators. There will naturally be a co-chairman from the Senate. As for the distribution of senatorial seats on the committee, this remains to be negotiated between the leaders of the parties.

Senator Rizzutto: Honourable senators, it is very important for some senators on this side to know how senators will be distributed on this committee. If the honourable senators agree, I propose to adjourn the debate until tomorrow so that you may provide us with further information on this matter. I find this very important. I think that we might agree to vote for your resolution if we had the assurance that the concerns and the objectives of the honourable senators can really be defended on the joint committee, without obstructing the work of our own committee which could sit at the same time. We could propose that the joint committee report on September 14. If the Senate finds this report inadequate, we could then continue our examination in a Committee of the Whole. This might be a valid solution. I suggest to the honourable senators that we could agree to have both committees. One could sit during the summer and continue to sit later if we find that the amendments proposed by the joint committee do not meet all the objectives of the honourable senators. It is extremely important for me to know how senators from this side will be represented. First, how many of the five senators chosen to sit on the joint committee will be from this side, and second, would it be possible for the co-chairman to be chosen among the senators from this side?

[Senator Tremblay.]

Honourable senators, I propose that the debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

• (1440)

[English]

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, before the debate is adjourned, I would like to say a few words about Senator Frith's argument. Back in 1978, Senator Frith said it was a joint address, and therefore it was proper to have a joint committee. But in spite of that fact, the Senate then had a separate committee as well.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that was with reference to the Senate aspects only. Read Senator Connolly's speech at the time.

Senator Godfrey: It was on the question of Senate reform, but, in any event it was a separate committee. As far as I am concerned, there is no precedent. We simply approach it on an individual case basis and decide whether, in certain cases, we want to have a separate committee as well as a joint committee.

[Translation]

Senator Le Moynes: Mr. Speaker, the debate has been adjourned.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

[English]

Senator Godfrey: I am sorry, I did not hear the interjection. In any event, it is not a question of precedent.

Honourable senators, I would like to say one other thing. I notice in the press that they seem to take for granted that the fact that the Senate is having a separate committee is a criticism of Mr. Turner and a criticism of the Meech Lake accord. As far as I am concerned, although I recognize some of the weaknesses of the Meech Lake accord, I support the accord, and I support Mr. Turner. When I was supporting the formation of a separate committee, it never occurred to me that I was in any way criticizing Mr. Turner or his position. I have talked to several other senators, and they say exactly the same.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, before the adjournment of this debate takes place, I would like to draw to the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate that there appears to be at least one flaw in his motion, and perhaps a second.

The flaw that is clear is that with respect to substitutions on the joint committee, he has taken, word for word, the clause from the motion as passed in the House of Commons, which provides only for substitution of members from the House of Commons. There should be an addition to that paragraph, or, alternatively, there should be a second paragraph, which should precede the paragraph with respect to the House of Commons, to correct that shortcoming in the motion.

The other difference in the two motions is in the preceding paragraph of the motion of the House of Commons, and it is with respect to the time involved. The paragraph now reads, in part:

... the report will be deemed submitted on the day such report is deposited with the Clerk of the House of Commons and with the Clerk of the Senate;

In the motion of the Honourable Leader of the Government, it says:

... on the day such report is deposited with the Clerk of the Senate.

I wonder if perhaps the motion should not be identical in that paragraph rather than leaving out the reference to the Clerk of the House of Commons. I just draw these matters to the attention of the Senate for possible correction.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, before the debate is adjourned, if it is in order to comment on the merits, as Senator Godfrey just did, I would like to say that, as always, Senator Frith's excellent legal mind has made a compelling case against a joint committee from a purely legal point of view. However, I feel that the art of politics often involves something more than pure legalisms, and it seems to me from a practical point of view that as we have established a Committee of the Whole of the Senate to consider this matter, there is nothing anomalous or incongruous in participating in a joint committee which can travel the country—

Senator MacEachen: That committee has no travel authority. That authority was refused in the House of Commons.

Senator van Roggen: I would think that is most unfortunate. Perhaps the Committee of the Whole in the Senate should give some thought as to whether or not that would be wise.

In any event, it seems to me that participation in the joint committee is not out of order, and that to have the report of that joint committee, which is to come down on a certain day in September, available to be considered by the Committee of the Whole in this place would be advantageous. On that basis, I will be supporting the motion when the time comes for the proposal.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, is it the wish of my friends opposite to move the adjournment of the debate?

Senator Frith: Adjournment of the debate has already been moved by Senator Rizzuto. I think it is because Senator Rizzuto yielded to Senator Godfrey. Senator Godfrey asked for leave to speak today before Senator Rizzuto moved the adjournment of the debate. The debate adjournment has simply been suspended in my view.

Senator Murray: Senator Rizzuto has not yet concluded his speech, has he?

Senator Rizzuto: This is the point, honourable senators, and I moved that the debate be adjourned to the Senate's next sitting.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise once more on the point of order I raised earlier, and which I feel is genuine. Nobody rose to argue against my submission.

On the other hand, the Government Leader in the Senate did not respond either. I will therefore ask His Honour the Speaker to rule on the validity of my point of order, later today or at a later sitting of the Senate, in view of course of the comments used by Senator Murray.

The Hon. the Speaker: I will take Senator Corbin's request under advisement.

Senator Murray: Is Hon. Senator Corbin suggesting that my resolution is not—

Senator Corbin: Senator Murray, I was in no way referring to the resolution as such. I was rather referring to certain remarks you made in your speech, where you referred to a majority decision in this house.

I argued the point that it is not proper, according to a longstanding parliamentary tradition, to comment on an earlier decision of the Senate, except to ask that the vote be rescinded.

I was suggesting that in my view, your comments offended a very ancient parliamentary tradition. Therefore, either you withdraw them immediately or, as I just did, I ask the Speaker to rule on the validity of my argument.

I think in that respect Beauchesne is quite clear, a vote must not be commented upon, and especially not refer to a majority decision. A majority decision commits the whole Chamber. It is not a majority decision, it is the Senate's decision. At that point, if you do not like it, the one option open to you is to move that the decision be rescinded.

So I cannot see how you can get out of that in any other way.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Will the ruling be coming from Mr. Speaker?

Senator Corbin: I asked the Speaker to rule—

Senator Flynn: To rule how?

Senator Corbin: —to rule on the point I raised. I think this is quite in order, Senator Flynn.

[English]

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I heard my friend speaking earlier in English on this point, and I made a note of it. I appreciate the point he has made, first of all, about my reference to a majority of this house. Actually, it was a majority of those voting rather than a majority of the house. In any case, if I misspoke myself and should have said a decision of the house, then I am perfectly prepared to amend my remarks in that respect.

As far as my remarks referred to a decision taken by the Senate a couple of days ago, I think he is stretching the point to suggest that my remarks were out of order. I did not reflect on the decision that had been taken by the Senate a couple of days ago. I did not comment on it. I did not try to reopen the debate. However, I thought and still think that the decision that was taken on Thursday is relevant to the motion that I have placed before the Senate today.

I do not object to the honourable senator raising these points at this time, and I accept the reproach to the extent that it may be valid. Frankly, I do not think it is a very big deal.

I want to be clear so far as Senator Rizzuto is concerned.

[Translation]

I take it, if I am not mistaken, that Senator Rizzuto suggested that we adjourn this debate so that I may be able to answer his questions tomorrow.

Senator Frith: That is right.

Senator Murray: Well, I am in a position to answer right now by saying first that there will be a co-chairman from the Senate in that special joint committee. Senator Rizzuto would like me to give him the assurance that this co-chairman will come from the Liberal ranks. I think that is going a little too far. I cannot speak for the committee which will have the last say in the choice of both co-chairmen. This is as far as I can go. There will be a co-chairman from the Senate. It will be up to the committee itself to select both co-chairmen.

Senator Frith: A special joint committee with a Commons, a government majority.

Senator Murray: This should not come as a shock to my honourable friend. After all, my friend—

Senator Frith: That is what they called the—

Senator Murray: With respect to the allocation of senator positions in that committee, Senator Rizzuto suggested that three senators be appointed by the Liberal group, and two by the Conservative group.

This is again a matter to be discussed between the leaders in the House. Personally, I have no argument with that distribution, namely, three members appointed by the Liberal party leadership, and two by the Conservative party leadership.

Those were the three questions raised by my honourable friend Senator Rizzuto. This is my answer, and I would not be in a position to tell you more tomorrow.

● (1450)

Senator Rizzuto: I understand full well, Senator Murray.

I already feel that I know a little more than I did ten minutes ago. As you said, there will be three senators from this side of the house, and two from the government side.

I appreciate that you cannot give us an assurance as to who will be appointed as the co-chairman to represent the Senate.

That is why I wanted to get that information, because it is important for me to reach a decision as to whether we should agree with your motion. Will the co-chairman from the Senate be elected by the five senators representing the minority on the special joint committee or will the committee itself appoint the co-chairman?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, under the current procedure, the special joint committee appoints both co-chairmen.

I have co-chaired the Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Official Languages

[Senator Murray.]

Policy and Programs. In that case, the Joint Committee appointed me as well as my friend Senator Corbin—

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: They have a co-chairman from each side.

Senator Murray: —who was a Member of the House of Commons at the time.

Senator Guay: The Standing Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on Official Languages Policy and Programs has a co-chairman from both sides, one Conservative and one Liberal.

[English]

Senator Godfrey: I have been here for 14 years, and this is the first time it has ever been suggested that a committee actually chooses its own chairman. The chairmen are always chosen by the leaders. Let's not kid ourselves.

[Translation]

Senator Rizzuto: Honourable senators, I realize the Leader of the Government in the Senate has a substantial input in the decisions made by the government, and I would like his opinion. I feel I must find some way of making a contribution to your motion, while at the same time we on this side of the house would have to have some measure of reassurance. I think we should let our senators voice their opinions to ensure that this committee is run in such a way that we all have a chance to express our views.

I don't mean that I have any doubts we will have a joint chairman, but we would like to have that assurance, so that when the time comes, we can make decisions more readily. If that assurance is not forthcoming, we will just have to wait and see. That is why I moved to adjourn the debate until the next sitting of the Senate, because this would give us a chance to think about it and to find out a bit more.

I would like to give the matter a bit more thought and see how we could manage to vote in favour of the motion moved by the Leader of the Government.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed. On motion of Senator Rizzuto, debate adjourned.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is Senator Corbin satisfied with the clarification provided by the Leader of the Government or should I still take his intervention under advisement?

Senator Corbin: Mr. Speaker, I am only partially satisfied. I would say to Senator Murray, either we meet this evening in front of the Centennial Flame to burn Beauchesne or I maintain my point of order and ask Your Honour to hand down a ruling at a subsequent sitting of the Senate.

I think my point of order is sound, and I would like to have this question clarified once and for all.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, on the subject of this point of order, it is a fact that the rule quoted by Senator Corbin exists. However, the same rule applies in the case of relevance. One can object to irrelevant or irregular statements at the time they are made, but once that has been done, the Chair cannot ask the Senator to retract any more than it can ask him to withdraw the irrelevant statements that are made so frequently in this chamber. There has never been a ruling of this kind.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I beg your pardon! On the contrary, I think there are quite a few precedents. I qualified my statement earlier when I rose, saying that I would have liked to speak right away. I did not want to look unprepared, however, and that is why I took the time to consult Beauchesne's. That was my only reason.

My point was not to delay today's proceedings. I know this is not exactly the most important question we have to discuss. I agree. Nevertheless, it is a matter of basic parliamentary procedure, and if we let this pass, how often is this going to happen in the future and how often has it already happened in the past?

Senator Flynn: It happens all the time!

Senator Corbin: Well, in that case, let's get together in front of the Centennial Flame this evening and burn Beauchesne's, because he is no use to us any more.

Senator Flynn: We can burn Beauchesne's and your questions as well.

● (1500)

[English]

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I should like to say a word or two about the point of order. The Leader of the Government in the Senate, who made the offensive remarks, has indicated that he is sorry. Then he said, unfortunately, that it is "no big deal." It is a big deal if we let people get away with that. That is the problem. The Leader of the Government would have been in order had he left it at that. As Senator Corbin has stated, history is full of Speaker's rulings that reflection on past votes is discourteous and out of order.

Senator Murray: I did not reflect.

Senator Olson: You did. If you disagree, we will wait until we see the "blues." If I remember correctly, what you said was, "because a majority of honourable senators voted for this resolution". You were using a reflection on a previous vote to argue for the current motion, and that clearly is discourteous and out of order.

Senator Murray: I am sorry my honourable friend is ashamed of his vote already.

Senator Olson: I am ashamed of your comments.

On motion of Senator Rizzuto, debate adjourned.

VENICE SUMMIT, 1987

On tabling of documents:

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, did the Deputy Leader of the Government include in the list of documents tabled a copy of the Venice communiqué? Perhaps he did include that, and, if so, I did not hear him. If not, could we have that at some point?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): It was not on the list. We do not have it here, but we will certainly arrange to have it brought in.

FOREIGN AFFAIRS

SEVENTH AND EIGHTH REPORTS OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDICES

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has the honour to present its Seventh and Eighth Reports.

I ask that each report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and to the Debates of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of Seventh Report, see Appendix "A", p. 1257. For text of Eighth Report, see Appendix "B", p. 1259.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall these reports be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator van Roggen, reports placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate of this day and that it form part of the permanent records of this House.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-22

SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE—STATUS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, before we move on to Notices of Inquiries, may I point out that the Special Committee of the Senate on the subject matter of Bill C-22 was to report to this chamber by June 15. This being June 16, I believe we should have a report from that committee on Bill C-22. Perhaps the chairman of the committee can present that report before we move on to the next item of business.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps we could revert to Reports of Committees in due course. I know that a report is available. I see that a copy has been put on my desk. I assume all honourable senators have received a copy. As a matter of fact, I can see that a report has been placed on the desks of those honourable senators who sit close to me.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): The report should be placed on the record.

Senator Frith: I do not know whether the chairman of the committee is putting some finishing touches to the report, but, in any event, Senator Phillips is quite right. I know the committee is aware of this. There is a document entitled "Second Report" on my desk, which fulfils that requirement. Perhaps we can revert to Reports of Committees later.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THE CONSTITUTION

PROPOSED CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, June 18, 1987, I will move that:

WHEREAS the Constitution Act, 1982 came into force on April 17, 1982, following an agreement between Canada and all the provinces except Quebec;

AND WHEREAS the Government of Quebec has established a set of five proposals for constitutional change and has stated that amendments to give effect to those proposals would enable Quebec to resume a full role in the constitutional councils of Canada;

AND WHEREAS the amendment proposed in the schedule hereto sets out the basis on which Quebec's five constitutional proposals may be met;

AND WHEREAS the amendment proposed in the schedule hereto also recognizes the principle of the equality of all the provinces, provides new arrangements to foster greater harmony and cooperation between the Government of Canada and the governments of the provinces and requires that conferences be convened to consider important constitutional, economic and other issues;

AND WHEREAS certain portions of the amendment proposed in the schedule hereto relate to matters referred to in section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982;

AND WHEREAS section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and the House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province;

NOW THEREFORE the Senate resolves that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation issued by Her Excellency the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada in accordance with the schedule hereto.

SCHEDULE CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987 CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

1. The Constitution Act, 1867 is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 1 thereof, the following section:

"2. (1) The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with

(a) the recognition that the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec but also present in Quebec, constitutes a fundamental characteristic of Canada; and

(b) the recognition that Quebec constitutes within Canada a distinct society.

(2) The role of the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures to preserve the fundamental characteristic of Canada referred to in paragraph (1)(a) is affirmed.

(3) The role of the legislature and Government of Quebec to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec referred to in paragraph (1)(b) is affirmed.

(4) Nothing in this section derogates from the powers, rights or privileges of Parliament or the Government of Canada, or of the legislatures or governments of the provinces, including any powers, rights or privileges relating to language."

2. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 24 thereof, the following section:

"25. (1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Senate, the government of the province to which the vacancy relates may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada the names of persons who may be summoned to the Senate.

(2) Until an amendment to the Constitution of Canada is made in relation to the Senate pursuant to section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the person summoned to fill a vacancy in the Senate shall be chosen from among persons whose names have been submitted under subsection (1) by the government of the province to which the vacancy relates and must be acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada."

3. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 95 thereof, the following heading and sections:

"AGREEMENTS ON IMMIGRATION AND ALIENS

95A. The Government of Canada shall, at the request of the government of any province, negotiate with the government of that province for the purpose of concluding an agreement relating to immigration or the temporary admission of aliens into that province that is appropriate to the needs and circumstances of that province.

95B. (1) Any agreement concluded between Canada and a province in relation to immigration or the temporary admission of aliens into that province has the force of law from the time it is declared to do so in accordance with subsection 95C(1) and shall from that time have effect notwithstanding class 25 of section 91 or section 95.

(2) An agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) shall have effect only so long and so far as it is not repugnant to any provision of an Act of the Parliament of Canada that sets national standards and objectives relating to immigration or aliens, including any provision that establishes general classes of immigrants or relates to levels of immigration for Canada or that prescribes classes of individuals who are inadmissible into Canada.

(3) The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms applies in respect of any agreement that has the force of law under subsection (1) and in respect of anything done by the Parliament or Government of Canada, or the legislature or government of a province, pursuant to any such agreement.

95C. (1) A declaration that an agreement referred to in subsection 95B(1) has the force of law may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of the province that is a party to the agreement.

(2) An amendment to an agreement referred to in subsection 95B(1) may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada only where so authorized

(a) by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of the province that is a party to the agreement; or

(b) in such other manner as is set out in the agreement.

95D. Sections 46 to 48 of the Constitution Act, 1982 apply, with such modifications as the circumstances require, in respect of any declaration made pursuant to subsection 95C(1), any amendment to an agreement made pursuant to subsection 95C(2) or any amendment made pursuant to section 95E.

95E. An amendment to sections 95A to 95D or this section may be made in accordance with the procedure set out in subsection 38(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, but only if the amendment is authorized by resolutions of the legislative assemblies of all the provinces that are, at the time of the amendment, parties to an agreement that has the force of law under subsection 95B(1)."

4. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately preceding section 96 thereof, the following heading:

"GENERAL"

5. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately preceding section 101 thereof, the following heading:

"COURTS ESTABLISHED BY THE PARLIAMENT OF CANADA"

6. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 101 thereof, the following heading and sections:

"SUPREME COURT OF CANADA

(2) The Supreme Court of Canada shall consist of a chief justice to be called the Chief Justice of Canada and eight other judges, who shall be appointed by the Governor General in Council by letters patent under the Great Seal.

101B. (1) Any person may be appointed a judge of the Supreme Court of Canada who, after having been admitted to the bar of any province or territory, has, for a total of at least ten years, been a judge of any court in Canada or a member of the bar of any province or territory.

(2) At least three judges of the Supreme Court of Canada shall be appointed from among persons who, after having been admitted to the bar of Quebec, have, for a total of at least ten years, been judges of any court of Quebec or of any court established by the Parliament of Canada, or members of the bar of Quebec.

101C. (1) Where a vacancy occurs in the Supreme Court of Canada, the government of each province may, in relation to that vacancy, submit to the Minister of Justice of Canada the names of any of the persons who have been admitted to the bar of that province and are qualified under section 101B for appointment to that court.

(2) Where an appointment is made to the Supreme Court of Canada, the Governor General in Council shall, except where the Chief Justice is appointed from among members of the Court, appoint a person whose name has been submitted under subsection (1) and who is acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada.

(3) Where an appointment is made in accordance with subsection (2) of any of the three judges necessary to meet the requirement set out in subsection 101B(2), the Governor General in Council shall appoint a person whose name has been submitted by the Government of Quebec.

101D. Sections 99 and 100 apply in respect of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada.

101E. (1) Sections 101A to 101D shall not be construed as abrogating or derogating from the powers of the Parliament of Canada to make laws under section 101 except to the extent that such laws are inconsistent with those sections.

(2) For greater certainty, section 101A shall not be construed as abrogating or derogating from the powers of the Parliament of Canada to make laws relating to the reference of questions of law or fact, or any other matters, to the Supreme Court of Canada."

7. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 106 thereof, the following section:

"106A. (1) The Government of Canada shall provide reasonable compensation to the government of a province that chooses not to participate in a national shared-cost program that is established by the Government of Canada after the coming into force of this section in an area of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, if the province carries on a program or initiative that is compatible with the national objectives.

(2). Nothing in this section extends the legislative powers of the Parliament of Canada or of the legislatures of the provinces."

8. The said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following heading and sections:

"XII—CONFERENCES ON THE ECONOMY AND OTHER MATTERS

148. A conference composed of the Prime Minister of Canada and the first ministers of the provinces shall be convened by the Prime Minister of Canada at least once each year to discuss the state of the Canadian economy and such other matters as may be appropriate.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-22

SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the second report of the Special Committee on the Subject Matter of Bill C-22, to amend the Patent Act and to provide for certain matters in relation thereto.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix “D”, p. 1264.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Bonnell, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

FINAL REPORT OF COMMITTEE—STATUS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, before we leave Reports of Committees, may I ask the chairman of the Special Committee on the Subject Matter of Bill C-22 when a final report will be submitted to the Senate?

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, in answer to the new member of the government ex officio, Senator Phillips, my colleague from the Island—

Senator Phillips: A temporary arrangement!

Senator Bonnell:—let me say that it is a difficult question to answer. It will be up to my committee. I am in the same position as the government leader in the house, who could not say today that a Liberal might be co-chairman of another committee because he could not tell you what the committee might decide. I am in the same position as your leader; I cannot tell you what my committee might decide, but as soon as they do decide, I will bring you the report.

Senator Phillips: I thank the honourable senator for his reply. However, I believe he is grossly out of order to compare himself with the Leader of the Government.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, last week I said—

Senator Frith: I thought it was charitable of him.

Senator Bonnell:—that he was next to me. He is still next to me!

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

REGIONAL INDUSTRIAL EXPANSION

ASSISTANCE TO INDUSTRY—ENTERPRISE CAPE BRETON

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government which relates to an answer that he provided on June 9 to a question that I had asked on February 3 with respect to the offers of assistance made to industry by Enterprise Cape Breton and the number of jobs reported.

I noticed in his reply, which I thank him for, that there were a number of blanks with respect to the amount disbursed to individual companies, and that there were also a lot of blanks with respect to the number of jobs created. Would the Leader of the Government undertake to provide us with a more complete answer in both respects, but particularly with respect to the amounts disbursed to individual enterprises, companies or individuals, and, if at all possible, if there were jobs created in any of these situations where there are blanks?

● (1520)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): As I recall, honourable senators, the question Senator Graham asked had to do with offers of assistance from Enterprise Cape Breton to various firms. I hope I am not assuming too much when I say that where there are blanks under "Amounts Disbursed," no moneys have been disbursed; and where there are blanks under "Jobs Created," obviously, the project has not yet begun and the jobs have not been created.

I will ask to have what appears to me to be an obvious explanation confirmed, and I will report back.

Senator Graham: As I understand it, honourable senators, 511 offers of assistance were made to industry and 352 offers were accepted. Certainly the total of firms, as listed here, would not come to 352. However, the very fact that they were listed would imply that some offer had been made and, indeed, accepted. That is the information I am looking for.

REQUEST FOR ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, on February 3 I posed a written question relating to the status of the LaPrade Fund, asking if, indeed, the terms of reference had changed, and so on. I wonder if I might expect an answer to that question from the Leader of the Government before the end of this week or the end of next week?

BRITISH COLUMBIA

SOUTH MORESBY—ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL PARK

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I am concerned about a headline in this morning's Globe and Mail which states, "No national park for South Moresby."

I want to assure the Leader of the Government in the Senate and all honourable senators here that South Moresby constitutes a big deal for the Haida as well as for many other Canadians.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate enlighten this chamber on that headline? Have talks, in fact, broken down, or is there a possibility that talks will continue? There are references in the article to the provincial government of British Columbia establishing one of its own parks under its own provincial laws, and that logging in some parts of the island will resume. That disturbs me greatly.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I regret I have to confirm that the talks have broken down. The Government of Canada has made an offer that we believe is more than fair and generous, and will be so regarded by all interested parties except, unfortunately, the Government of British Columbia, which feels that the offer is not high enough.

For the record, let me say that the value of an offer that was made by the Government of Canada is in excess of $100 million over a ten-year period.

Senator Marchand: As a supplementary question, is there any hope that discussions will resume?

This is an extremely important matter not only for the Indians of that area but for all Indians of Canada and, indeed, all Canadians. Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate take another look at this matter and perhaps persuade Mr. Mulroney, the Prime Minister, to take another look at it? This extremely important matter involving the future of the Haidas should not be dropped.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Prime Minister has been involved and has discussed the matter with the premier, and so, too, has the Deputy Prime Minister.

I do not know what more we can do. We have made what I think is a more than fair and more than reasonable offer, and the Government of British Columbia has indicated that Canada's offer of $100 million is not enough. I do not think we can go beyond our present position.

The honourable senator may wish to make inquiries of the government of his province on the matter.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, I will do that. However, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate be good enough to either table some background documents on this matter in the Senate or perhaps provide background documentation to me privately so that I can better inform myself on the details of this subject and, in particular, of the position as put forward by the Government of Canada?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I do not know what documents are available that I could properly table here, but I can give my friend some information concerning the last offer which was made by the Government of Canada through the Deputy Prime Minister less than a week ago, on June 10.

We offered to pay for acquisition of non-forestry third-party interests, estimated at less than $1 million. We would pay $32 million for park operating and capital development over ten years. We would pay 75 per cent of the cost of acquiring third-party forestry interests which are normally shared 50-50: The estimated cost of this would be $23 million. We would contribute $50 million over ten years to a Queen Charlotte Islands regional development fund to support the diversification of the regional economy. The total value of the offer is $106 million over ten years.

I may add to that that there is no dispute over the boundary. The British Columbia position is acceptable to Canada. It protects all of Lyell Island, including Windy Bay. To that I can only add that our offer is still on the table, and that the Government of Canada remains committed, as ever, to seeking a resolution to the issue.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. Is the Leader of the Government free to give us an idea of the dollar gap between the two governments?

It has been mentioned in the Vancouver press that the B.C. government has objected to the federal government offer, which does not provide sufficient to pay out the private forestry interests that will be expropriated as a result of the establishment of the park. I presume this refers to people's cutting rights.

From what the Leader of the Government has just said, it appears that the federal government offer involves paying 75 per cent of these forestry rights which were estimated at $23 million. That would indicate that the other 25 per cent is only about $7 million, which the provincial government will be expected to pay. Could he confirm that that is the only matter standing between the two parties in the settlement of this question?

Senator Murray: No, honourable senators. I do not have the entire file in front of me, but I do know that, for example, with regard to the $50 million that we were to contribute over ten years to a Queen Charlotte Islands regional development fund to support diversification of the regional economy, British Columbia had asked for a $100 million fund.

AGRICULTURE

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS TO WESTERN GRAIN FARMERS FOR 1987 CROP YEAR

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government will know that I am interested in whether or not there will be a program dealing with an acreage payment for the prairies for 1987.

I asked him a number of questions about the final payment, or the 70 per cent, for that program that was announced for 1986. I appreciate the answer he gave the other day to the effect that the cheques were going to be in the mail. I know quite a few farmers who have not yet received their cheques, but I expect that they are in the mail.

What I want to know today, although I do not expect an answer immediately, is whether or not the government is going to have a program for 1987 similar to that for 1986. There has been a further decline in the price of grain by at least 18 per cent in the initial price. We do not know what the final payment will be, but thus far there is no indication that it will be compensated for in a final payment. Therefore, I would like to know before we adjourn on June 29 whether farmers can feel some relief from this through an announcement of the government.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have nothing to add to the statements that were made on this matter in the other place as recently as yesterday by the Prime Minister. He said that the programs that will be introduced will be adapted to the circumstances, and will be designed to help Canadian farmers. He said that he and members of the government will be meeting with farmers, farm groups and provincial governments on this matter.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, many of those meetings have already taken place. The Leader of the Government advised me about two weeks ago that such meetings were taking place. Indeed, the provincial premiers of the four western provinces at a meeting about two weeks ago made their declaration as to what was an appropriate program at that time. I believe that the minimum indicated by the premiers of Alberta and Saskatchewan was a program involving something like $1.6 billion. Is the minister saying now that that is the information the Prime Minister was seeking and is now prepared to act upon?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I cannot undertake that a decision or an announcement will be made on this matter before we rise for the summer. But then, I do not know when we are going to rise for the summer.

PRIVATE BILL

YELLOWKNIFE ELECTRIC LTD.—THIRD READING

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the third reading of Bill S-10, to revive Yellowknife Electric Ltd. and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Business Corporations Act.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Have we received a report from the committee on this bill?

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I understand that Senator Neiman reported this bill without amendment on Thursday of last week. I was informed that that took place, but I was not here.

Senator Frith: I don't remember that happening, but if that is so, of course, we would proceed to third reading.

Yes, Bill S-10 was reported last Thursday.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I am informed by Senator Frith and by the Clerk that this bill was reported on Thursday of last week.

Senator Frith: I see that from my notes; I am sorry.

Senator Nurgitz: Once more I move third reading of this bill!

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

VENICE SUMMIT, 1987

COMMUNIQUE TABLED

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, in response to a request made by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition earlier that the Venice Declaration be tabled, I table a declaration of the heads of government from the industrialized nations meeting at Venice last week.

Document tabled.

MARRIAGE (PROHIBITED DEGREES) BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the third reading of Bill S-5, to amend and consolidate the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFIT ENTITLEMENT ADJUSTMENTS (PENSION PAYMENTS) BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Robertson, seconded by the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, for the second reading of the Bill C-50, An Act respecting the treatment of pension payments in determining certain unemployment insurance benefit entitlements and to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.—(Honourable Senator Marsden).

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I rise to speak on second reading of Bill C-50. This is a most unfortunate bill. It has been put upon Parliament to get the government out of a difficult situation—an unpopular situation—which began in a messy way in 1984, and which ends in an even more messy fashion in 1987. The underlying premise of this legislation is that unemployment insurance should be changed. Senator Robertson, when speaking on second reading, explained the content of the bill and called these changes to unemployment insurance "promised" changes. But Canadians working in an occupation with a high rate of lay-offs, or with early retirement as the only alternative, consider these changes not as being "promised" but as being "threatened" by the government in 1984. As Mary Collins, member of Parliament for Capilano, said in her comments on the bill:

The principle . . . is that the income one derives from unemployment whether it is through wages, separation pay, or personal income, is considered income. This, of course, was the reason that back in November, 1984, this government had announced that pension income and severance pay would be treated as income for the purpose of defining UI benefits.

In theory, this sounds quite reasonable, especially if the person listening to the theory has a good income, steady employment, good pension benefits, and little likelihood of having to bridge the gap between employment and pension benefits after age 65. But good theory often makes bad policy, and in this case the utter unfairness and cruelty of this policy has been exposed. One month after the government announced these regulatory changes, so many workers to be affected by this regulatory move had protested that the Minister of Employment—then the Honourable Flora MacDonald—had to announce that the pension income provisions would not come into effect until January 1986, and that the severance provisions would apply to collective agreements signed after December 31, 1984, and to individuals receiving severance pay after April 1, 1985. These changes caused additional confusion and protest.

It was clear to Canadian workers, unions, employers and other observers that the government had walked into sinking sand, without doing any careful thought, planning, impact studies or testing. It showed Canadians how far from the experience of every day life this government really is. So, in March 1985, when Mr. Mulroney chaired his federal economic conference, he was embarrassed by a petition, signed by 80 out of 136 of his hand-picked conference delegates, which protested against these arbitrary changes to unemployment insurance.

What the government had done was to break faith with workers and employers who had paid the UI premiums for many years and who were organizing their financial lives upon the quite reasonable expectation that the rules would not be changed in mid-stream. Not only had the government broken faith but it had done so at a particular moment in history that maximized the damage and suffering caused, because we are going through a period of profound change in the ways of industrial life.

Thousands of workers in Canadian industries are finding that their jobs are disappearing. For example, in September 1985 Inco of Sudbury was struggling to save jobs and the economy of that area by an early retirement program that would avoid having to impose a mass lay-off of between 500 and 1,000 younger workers. Essential to their early retirement program was the use by the workers of unemployment insurance benefits for a period to bridge them to severance and retirement benefits. This change in regulations threw the plans of Inco into total confusion. But such cases of labour market adjustment are not the only ones. In the Armed Forces, the RCMP and some other occupations, retirement must come at an age much earlier than 65. Such workers are expected to find another job. Some years ago this was not very difficult, but now, as all honourable senators know, jobs are very difficult to find, both for young workers entering the labour force and for older workers. Such people, while they search, need the unemployment insurance benefits to which they have contributed or the severance payments available to them.

So the regulatory change imposed an indignity and cruelty upon people who had contributed to the economy of this country for many years—people who in many cases had children still in school or university; who had mortgages still being paid; people planning retirement years who do not necessarily have a wage-earning spouse, because in some cases they had been highly geographically mobile people throughout their working lives.

The deadline changes described above added further to the confusion and unfairness of the situation. So, when January 5, 1986, rolled around, many workers who had become eligible for early retirement, but who did not know of the government's change in regulations, learned only when they filed for unemployment insurance that their pension payments would be considered as income in the calculation of unemployment insurance benefits.

This came as a terrible shock to all sorts of good working Canadians. People most likely not to be aware of regulatory changes are those people most likely to be in precarious financial circumstances. So by May of 1986, there was such an uproar that there was a demonstration on Parliament Hill of 1,200 workers, eligible for early retirement, against these regulations.

By July 1986, the Ontario government, objecting strenuously to the federal moves, amended its own Employment Standards Act, to order employers to pay severance pay in two weekly instalments, in an effort to nullify the effect of the regulatory changes and to reduce the waiting period to three weeks at most.

In December, 1986, the government's own Forget Commission recommended that unemployment insurance payments be retroactively reimbursed to those early retirees who had been deprived of them since January 5. Action groups met with Mr. Bouchard to get the new minister to reconsider actions of the government, and to pay reimbursement to those who were suffering loss by this arbitrary measure. In January of this year, 1,000 people attended a meeting organized by the Association of Early Retirees Without Unemployment Insurance of Quebec and other groups to demand action from the minister. Again, in February and March this year, other meetings, demonstrations and strong protests took place in Quebec and across the country.

In short, the government was being made aware by the people of how shocked Canadians are that their own government would do such damage to working people, who are caught in a process of worldwide industrial change, in an age of high unemployment, few retraining opportunities, and wide regional disparities.

Honourable senators will have noticed that these changes were not in the form of legislation but were imposed by regulation. Under pressure from the people, from the opposition Liberals and the NDP in the House of Commons, and from the country, the government, clearly embarrassed by its disastrous mistake, tabled on April 1, 1987, the bill now before us. The bill is the government's best effort to save face, and its most insidious effort to continue with these changes to the UI program.

The first part of the bill will undo the government's first mistake, because it will reimburse unemployment insurance payments that would have been received under the old rules to all early retirees who filed for unemployment insurance benefits before January 5, 1986. Of course, those people should be reimbursed, and this should have happened months ago.

The government introduced this bill on April 1, 77 days ago, and then did absolutely nothing to advance the bill further until June 9, when the government suddenly wanted the bill passed in the other place in one day.

With respect to the reimbursement, the case is so obvious, since the situation should never have arisen in the first place, that no one here would deny consent for this aspect of the bill. Liberals certainly wanted reimbursement cheques mailed out months ago, when the Post Office was still delivering such cheques.

Unfortunately, that is not all that is contained in the bill. The second part of the bill contains one of the most deviant proposals ever to be put with respect to unemployment insurance—and that is quite a record—and a proposal to which we do have strong objections—very strong objections. This part of the bill requires that people who file for unemployment insurance benefits after January 5, 1986, have to find another job, work a sufficient number of weeks to qualify for unemployment insurance, and then lose that new job before being entitled to receive unemployment insurance while receiving pension benefits.

Can honourable senators imagine such a perverse scheme being put up by a government which is governing a modern country? There are some people who are fond of criticizing those who claim unemployment insurance benefits. There are those who say that Canadians bend rules and common sense in order to get those benefits. Some people complain about the 10/42 effect in Newfoundland, where unemployment is widely distributed so that many can collect benefits. These are the sort of grave suspicions raised which led to the appointment of the Forget commission, for example. But surely no one can say that this clause of Bill C-50 is any less calculating, devious or conniving than their worst accusations of the abuses of unemployment insurance.

Furthermore, since the findings of the Forget commission make clear that most unemployment insurance beneficiaries are short term, are in genuine compliance with the rules, and that the unemployment insurance program cannot be properly reformed until there is some good income support program in place, then this half of the bill that we are considering this afternoon compounds rather than helps the problem.

We consider that this clause of the bill is unfair, discriminatory and unacceptable. The provisions in this bill with respect to severance pay are designed to nullify the provisions passed by the Ontario government to protect certain pensioners, for example.

This bill should be split into two parts. The reimbursement of those who lost benefits should go ahead at once. The other changes to the unemployment insurance system, especially in light of the refusal of this government recently to move forward to the planned changes to unemployment insurance, should be postponed. A motion to split the bill was made in the House of Commons and rejected by the government.

Should we in this chamber try to split the bill? Honourable senators, it is the strong sentiment of my party that a government which cared about Canadian workers, which cared about fairness and reasonableness, which was concerned about improving the lot of working Canadians faced with early retirement or with layoffs, or in hard pressed regions of this country, would, first, never have introduced any such arbitrary regulation; or, second, having done so, would recognize its mistake and retract it at once; or, third, would have introduced only the first part of this bill; or, fourth, would have left such tinkering changes as are in the second half until there was a proper overhaul of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

This government is not being reasonable, is not being concerned about fairness to Canadian workers, and is not on top of its brief with respect to unemployment insurance. After consultation, we believe that forcing the government to divide this bill would only have the effect of delaying the reimbursement of those Canadians now waiting with increasing desperation for the cheques which the government's failure to move has already delayed since April 1. We wanted those cheques to have gone months ago, and we want them to go right away. We are ashamed and embarrassed, however, to have to rush through the other part of the legislation in order to get those cheques out. We are embarrassed to work with a government that brings in such a bill.

Today I received a telegram, and I am sure other honourable senators have received similar telegrams, which reads as follows:

The Federal Superannuates National Association protests most strongly against the enactment of Bill C-50 which will enshrine the unjust and discriminatory policy that deems pension income to be earned income for unemployment insurance purposes. We urge you to do everything possible to defeat this iniquitous measure.

It is signed:

William J. Mullen, National Secretary Treasurer.

Honourable senators, we assure Mr. Mullen, everyone in this chamber, and all Canadians that when the Liberal government is formed, redress of these wrongs to Canadian working people will be at the top of our agenda.

● (1550)

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I must remind honourable senators that if the honourable Senator Robertson speaks now, her speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators, I listened with interest to the remarks of my good friend and colleague. I want to assure honourable senators that there are no threats in this bill. The bill is very clear. I believe it is not unusual for governments to introduce legislation, listen to the complaints about that legislation, and then be flexible where they possibly can. I believe that in this case the government has followed this practice.

I must say that I feel a little embarrassment over the timing as to when the bill was introduced in the House of Commons. I would have liked to see the bill—and I am sure all honourable senators feel the same—introduced in the House of Commons earlier. An attempt had been made on a number of occasions during those 77 days. The minister was just as anxious as Senator Marsden to introduce the bill earlier, but, unfortunately, the orders of the House did not permit it. Of course, the orders of the House are a joint responsibility.

I can understand that there might be a difference in philosophy. I would like to review for honourable senators some of the basic principles in this bill so that there is no confusion. This government believes that persons who have retired from the labour market should not look to unemployment insurance as a supplementary source of income. This government also recognizes that there is a difference between people who retire and leave the labour market and people who retire and begin subsequent careers. This bill addresses this difference, and ensures that people who retire and begin subsequent careers are treated fairly and equitably as active members of the labour force.

On December 5, 1986, this government noted that there were allegations of imprecise information about the implementation of the January 5, 1986, rules concerning pension income. The government proposed at that time that it establish a process to re-examine any case where people had alleged that they made their decision to retire on the basis of inaccurate information from federal government sources. Indeed, there was a lot of confusion around those directives. To this end, an administrative procedure and a draft questionnaire were prepared. Upon examination of this procedure, we saw the likelihood of excessive administrative complexity arising. Therefore, to eliminate such complexity and the potential for uneven application across the country, the government brought about changes to the implementation of the January 5, 1986, ruling.

The legislation we are speaking on today draws a clear and simple line to ensure fairness in the transitional provisions of this regulation for early retirees. The rule is simply this: Those who applied for unemployment insurance prior to January 5, 1986—that is to say, those who applied under the previous rules—will have their entitlement to benefits determined under the previous rules. Equally straightforward, those who applied for benefits on or after January 5, 1986, will be governed by the new provisions. There is nothing devious there. It is all straightforward and clear.

Members may recall that on December 5, 1986, this government announced its intention to modify the unemployment insurance legislation dealing with pension earnings. While maintaining the principle that persons who have retired should not use unemployment insurance as supplementary income, the announcement proposed that workers who take other employment after their retirement, and then work long enough to requalify for unemployment insurance benefits, should receive those benefits, without any deduction of the previous pension income. The approach seems to be a sensible one, and it also seems that it is receiving general approval in a number of areas. Of course, I understand that whenever legislation is changed, there is apprehension and resistance on the part of the general public until it understands the changes.

With this bill the government amends the pension regulations to permit what I just described to begin as of April 5, 1987. Moreover, this bill permits retroactive requalification back to January 5, 1986. These changes will ensure that workers who start subsequent careers—and many of them do—and contribute to unemployment insurance, and subsequently become unemployed, will be entitled to full unemployment insurance benefits based on their post-retirement income, regardless of their previous pension income.

As Senator Marsden emphasized, the bill also addresses an issue of fairness which has arisen in connection with the treatment of payments upon separation. Honourable senators will recall that on March 31, 1985, the treatment of payments upon separation for unemployment insurance purposes was changed. Since its introduction, certain employer-employee agreements have sought to take advantage of what can only be described as a loophole in the wording of the current UI regulations. Of course, the purpose of these arrangements is to avoid the clear legislative intention. The honourable senator has referred to Bill C-128 already, and it addresses the same issue. However, with this bill the government changes the regulations to close those loopholes to ensure that people will not be able to receive double indemnification; namely, receive separation pay and unemployment insurance at the same time. These regulatory changes become effective April 5, 1987.

The proposed bill will also permit the extension of both the qualifying and benefit periods when an allocation of separation payments has prevented the payment of UI benefits or has delayed the start of the UI claim. For instance, if an allocation of separation pay delays the start of a claim by seven weeks, the qualifying period can be extended by seven weeks.

[Senator Robertson.]

I believe that the bill is clear. It also shows that the government is caring, responsible and fair. As I mentioned earlier, a change usually, in fact, almost always, brings protest. However, it seems to me that when a government has been mandated by the people to change the way things were governed before the last election, we would not be serving the people very well if we did not indicate and bring about changes which we feel are for the benefit of all Canadians.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

CANADIAN EXPLORATION AND DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVE PROGRAM BILL

ORDER STANDS

Order stands in name of Senator Balfour.

PRIVATE BILL

WINDSOR-DETROIT TUNNEL—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition) moved the second reading of Bill S-11, to authorize the City of Windsor to acquire, operate and dispose of the Windsor-Detroit Tunnel.

● (1600)

He said: Honourable senators, Bill S-11, as can be seen from its title, deals with the Windsor-Detroit Tunnel. In order to explain this bill to you, I intend to employ the journalistic device of the five “Ws”: what; who; why; when and where. Therefore, first let me tell you that while the background to the bill is of historical interest and the subject is rather interesting, the essential reason the bill is before us is a legal one, as you will see.

Honourable senators, as to the “what”, this bill concerns the Canadian portion of the Detroit-Windsor Tunnel, which is a motor vehicle tunnel that carries traffic under the Detroit River between Windsor and Detroit. No doubt many honourable senators have actually used that tunnel to go from Windsor to Detroit and back to Windsor.

To come to the “who”, the petitioner is the City of Windsor, and what we are being asked to do in this bill is simply to clarify what may be regarded as an imperfect expression of Parliament's intention when it enacted a private act in 1953 respecting the tunnel.

As to the "why", we are being asked to do this because the City of Windsor, pursuant to an agreement that it signed with the company that built the tunnel in the late 1920s, anticipates acquiring ownership of the tunnel in 1990, and wishes to make doubly sure that it has the power—and I underline "power," and you will see why in a moment—to acquire and operate the tunnel.

Honourable senators, although the bill itself is short—you will note that it contains only three clauses—the legislative and legal history of the tunnel is somewhat more complex. For example, you will note that the preamble to the bill is much longer than the bill itself. In explaining that history I will, therefore, try, as they say, "to keep it simple," although that may not be easy.

That brings us, then, to the "when". The Canadian half of the tunnel was authorized to be built by a private Act of Parliament, assented to on March 31, 1927. That act incorporated The Detroit and Windsor Subway Company and gave the company the authority to construct and operate the tunnel. At the same time similar legislation enacted in the United States gave authority to the Michigan corporation, the Detroit and Canada Tunnel Corporation, to construct and operate the American half of the tunnel.

The Canadian Authorizing Act of 1927—to which I have just referred—among other provisions, contained a declaration that the works and undertakings of the subway company—that is, the tunnel and all of its assets and facilities—were to be for the general advantage of Canada. I know students of constitutional law, and certainly some students of politics, will recognize the famous "declaratory power" that is referred to there; that being subsection 10 of section 92 of the British North America Act, 1867. Honourable senators will remember that section 92 is the section that sets out the classes of subjects over which the provinces have legislative jurisdiction. It starts as follows:

In each Province the Legislature may exclusively make Laws in relation to Matters coming within the Classes of Subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say,—

It then talks of direct taxation, the borrowing of money, and so on. Subsection 10 then says:

Local Works and Undertakings other than such as are of the following Classes:—

It then refers to certain Lines of Steam and other Ships, and so on. Then:

- (c) Such Works as, although wholly situate within the Province, are before or after their Execution declared by the Parliament of Canada to be for the general Advantage of Canada or for the Advantage of Two or more of the Provinces.

Therefore, that is the original wording of the famous—or according to some people infamous—declaratory power, and was exercised in this case in the act of 1927, which is a pivotal act to what we are concerned with here today.

The act of 1927 also stated that the Railway Act was to apply to the tunnel. That was because it was originally contemplated that the tunnel project would accommodate a railway system as well as motor vehicles. As it turned out, it did not, and those of you who have visited Windsor and observed the waterway between Windsor and Detroit are familiar with the rather regular and constant passage of barges taking railway cars back and forth. There is also, I believe, a railway bridge. In any event, the original intention was to have provision for railway facilities in the tunnel, but that did not take place.

Another key provision of this important 1927 act was that construction of the tunnel could not begin without the consent of the City of Windsor, and could only be carried out on terms to be agreed upon with the city.

The Detroit and Windsor Subway Company subsequently obtained the City of Windsor's consent to construct and operate the tunnel upon the terms and conditions contained in another pivotal agreement that I shall refer to as the "option agreement", dated April 24, 1928. So there is a difference between the original act of 1927 and the next step, which was the option agreement in 1928. Honourable senators, that will be very important for our consideration. In that option agreement the company agreed, in exchange for the right to construct the tunnel under city property, to give the City of Windsor the option to acquire the tunnel at the end of 60 years from the date of its formal opening. The American company on the other side of the river entered into a similar arrangement with the City of Detroit.

Following the signing of the 1928 agreement, construction by both companies began, and if you have been listening and paying attention, you will want to know when the tunnel was completed to know when the option period starts to run. The tunnel was completed and opened for business on November 3, 1930.

Three years later the Ontario legislature enacted the City of Windsor Act, 1933. It ratified and confirmed the 1928 option agreement.

In 1953 the two companies that constructed the tunnel negotiated the sale of the tunnel to the Port of Detroit Commission, a Michigan municipal corporation, for $18 million, subject to the State of Michigan approving the transaction. In anticipation of the sale, the Canadian company also petitioned Parliament for an act to amend the 1927 authorizing act in order to permit the sale.

In response to the company's petition, Parliament passed a private act on March 31, 1953. That is the next important date. That private act amended the 1927 act and permitted the sale of the tunnel to "any public authority, body or commission constituted under the laws of Canada or of the United States of America or of the State of Michigan."

Honourable senators, I do not want to make a cliff-hanger of this, but I will read that again, because in a moment you will see that there is a very important omission there.

Senator Doody: Not the Province of Ontario?

● (1610)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, that sounds like a set-up, because that is exactly the point of my wanting to read that section again. Obviously Senator Doody is paying attention.

In order to preserve the City of Windsor's rights, Parliament ratified and confirmed the option agreement, and it was set out in a schedule to the act.

The amendment, however, was deficient in that it neglected to expressly permit the sale of the tunnel to a public authority, body or commission constituted under the laws of Ontario, although it inferentially granted permission by ratifying and confirming the option agreement. Having mentioned the other headings, the question is raised, why did it not mention Ontario?

The proposed sale by the two companies to the Port of Detroit Commission was not approved by the State of Michigan, and the transaction did not, therefore, take place.

Let us now move forward to the next important date. In 1978 Ford Motor Properties Inc. began developing the now famous and I must say impressive Renaissance Center on the Detroit waterfront on lands adjacent to the Detroit Tunnel plaza. The company that had built the American half of the tunnel, that is, the Detroit and Canada Tunnel Corporation, acknowledged the City of Detroit's right to acquire the U.S. portion of the tunnel and, accordingly, conveyed the tube and plaza lands to the City. So, the Detroit side received, by conveyance, the tube and plaza lands. A series of complex transactions were simultaneously completed with the result that the City of Detroit and Ford Motor Properties Inc. now own the plaza lands, the City of Detroit owns the tube, and the Detroit and Canada Tunnel Corporation has the franchise to operate the U.S. portion of the tunnel.

In August, 1985, just a couple of years ago, the City of Windsor authorized preparations to enable it to exercise its right to acquire the tunnel on November 3, 1990—an important date, because the option was for 60 years—under the option agreement, and it is now seeking an Act of Parliament clearly conferring upon it, that is, upon the City, the power to do so. The Ontario legislature on November 27, 1986, has already enacted a private act expressly conferring on the City of Windsor the capacity to acquire, own and operate the Canadian portion of the tunnel. Clearly, the City now has the capacity to acquire, own and operate the Canadian portion of the tunnel. However, remember, there was that declaration—

Senator Doody: Will there be a written or oral test when you are finished?

Senator Frith: That is a good question. I am not going to tell you, but you are free to take notes.

[Senator Frith.]

The capacity was granted by the act passed by the Province of Ontario last November. However, if Bill S-11 is enacted, it will make it clear that the City of Windsor has the power to acquire, own and operate the Canadian portion of the tunnel. Our role is important because of the declaratory power that was exercised under section 92(10), declaring this to be a work for the general benefit of Canada. That is where the feds come into play again.

Section 2 provides that the Canadian portion of the tunnel will continue to be a work for the general advantage of Canada, and that the Railway Act will continue to apply to the operation of the tunnel and to any future disposal of the tunnel.

I have to tell you that the City of Windsor commenced an action in the Supreme Court of Ontario against the Detroit and Canada Tunnel Corporation and the Detroit and Windsor Subway Company to declare the option agreement valid. We are getting resistance from the people on the other side and resistance from those against whom the City of Windsor wishes to exercise its option. The City of Windsor commenced an action in the Supreme Court of Ontario against the Detroit and Canada Tunnel Corporation and the Detroit and Windsor Subway Company to declare the option agreement valid and enforceable, and to identify the assets included in the transaction.

I want to underline, honourable senators, that Bill S-11 does not affect the rights of the parties under the option agreement. It simply corrects the omission contained in the 1953 private act, and makes it clear that the City of Windsor has the power to do that which Parliament intended when it ratified and confirmed the option agreement in 1953.

So, by way of a postscript, I add that because of that lawsuit some senators and some others may wish to consider the application of the sub judice convention—the principle that Parliament does not interfere in matters before the courts. I remind honourable senators that this question has come up previously in other contexts. It is important to realize that the sub judice convention is not of that wide an application that some people think.

The sub judice convention, for example, does not apply to bills. Also, in civil cases, the convention does not apply until the matter has reached the trial stage. In this case the trial stage of the present action instituted in the City of Windsor has not yet been reached. At the present time the parties are only in the preliminary stages of examination for discovery.

I will give you the reference on the sub judice aspects. It is pages 118 and 119 from Beauchesne's Fifth Edition. The citations are 335 and 337.

Honourable senators, I have one further request to make. It is the hope that the bill can be passed here and in the other place before June 30. Normally a private bill goes to a committee. There is an impression that it has to go to a committee. However, if you read the rule, the rule says that if it is referred to a private committee, it has to spend a week there. It does not say that it has to go there.

I would like to ask my colleagues on the other side if they would be prepared to have the bill go to the other place without a reference to a committee. I will undertake to try to answer any questions I can on the continuation of second reading debate. Also, I have with me all the statutes and documents that are referred to in my comments. Of course, we could consider some questions at third reading. I say that because I suspect that those who are interested in this bill will be limited in number, and it may be that we can deal with these questions here; it may also be the case that we cannot. The most I can reasonably ask honourable senators to do is to give it a try at second reading, to raise questions, to see if, in closing the debate on second reading, I can satisfy any questions that are raised. If I am unable to do so, then it would have to go to committee.

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Frith will entertain a question. Does he know the precise nature of the civil suit that is pending?

Senator Frith: I have a copy of the pleadings in my office. I will look it up to confirm what I am about to say, but the essence of the action is to have a court order declaring the option agreement of 1928 valid. We are not here validating that agreement; we are simply giving them the power to take advantage of the agreement if the courts hold that it is a valid agreement.

• (1620)

Senator Nurgitz: So the Senate bill will be so precise that it will avoid the possibility of conflicting with the sub judice rule?

Senator Frith: Yes. That is what we hope to be the case, and have to take care that we are not, for any other reason, breaching the convention of sub judice.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I should like to put a question to Senator Frith as well. In fact, I had begun asking him for this very information just before we were summoned to the chamber earlier today.

This is a private bill. Does it have the effect, if we adopt it, of establishing an exception to the general law of Canada?

Senator Frith: No, I would say not, honourable senators. What it will have the effect of doing is clarifying the terms of a previous act of the Parliament of Canada, also based on a private bill. This bill tries to clarify the intention of that earlier act of Parliament. It does not, as such, create an exception to the general law of Canada.

Senator Corbin: I take it, then, that there is no other vehicle available, administratively speaking, in the executive branch of government to do what Senator Frith is asking this house to do today.

Senator Frith: I would say not. If I had been here back in 1928 when the original bill was passed, perhaps I would not have been able to say that, or perhaps I could have. I say that only to assure Senator Corbin and other honourable senators that, because the other act was passed, what we are now doing is simply clarifying that previous act. No one else could do that. Therefore, I do not think those other possibilities exist.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, rule 93 states:

After its second reading, a private bill shall be referred to a committee, and any representations before the Senate for or against such bill stand referred to such a committee.

Is there another rule I missed since you indicated a while ago this will not be referred to committee?

Senator Frith: I will have to look that up. I think there is a provision that requires it to stay for a week. I do not know whether rule 93—

Senator Doody: Rule 93 says it has to be referred to a committee.

Senator Frith: I am not sure that this is a private—

Senator Doody: It says, “private”.

Senator Frith: Yes, but there are two kinds—a private member’s private bill and a private member’s public bill. I will have to check that. Thank you for drawing that to my attention.

On motion of Senator Doody, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

REGIONAL VICAR FOR CANADA OF THE PRELATURE OF THE HOLY CROSS AND OPUS DEI—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bélisle, seconded by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, for the second reading of the Bill S-7, An Act to incorporate the Regional Vicar for Canada of the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei.—(Honourable Senator Corbin).

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I had promised Senator Bélisle that I was going to speak to this bill today. However, most unhappily and regretfully, I must renege on the promise I made to him because of a technical delay and the delay in my research on this bill. I am not in a position to speak today, so I would ask that this order be stood again in my name.

Order stands.

CITIZENSHIP ACT.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have nothing to say on this item. I realize that Senator Bosa is most anxious to get this bill referred to committee. I made some inquiries, and there does not appear to be anything that will upset the applecart, as it were, so in order to get answers to the questions I have, I should like to move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. We can then call the appropriate witnesses from the department and move the bill along.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we think this item should stand. We are in the process of discussing such details as the chairmanship, membership of the steering committee, and so forth. Until we have established such things, I think we should stand the order.

Order stands.

- 27th Standing Rules and Orders;
- 28th Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am here armed with what I hope are answers for Senator Roblin. Is it the wish of the Senate to have these items stand until Senator Roblin is present? All of these committees are waiting, although I do not know that they need their funds right away; I have not received any complaints. However, I am prepared to do what the Senate thinks is appropriate.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, last week these items were stood until the return of Senator Roblin. I do not believe he will be present this week either. Perhaps we should stand these matters until the beginning of next week.

Orders stand.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of the Bill C-22, An Act to amend the Patent Act and to provide for certain matters in relation thereto, held 29 meetings to which attended 39 senators (see list in Appendix A) in the 10 provincial capitals and heard testimony from 191 groups or individuals (see Appendix B) including the Minister for Consumer and Corporate Affairs, The Honourable Harvie Andre.

The Committee had to postpone its original schedule due to approval of the budget on May 12, 1987, which delayed the local notices of public hearings in the Maritimes.

The Committee had to redraft all of its travel plans to regroup the ten provincial capitals in 3 consecutive weeks.

On May 26, 1987 in Charlottetown, P.E.I., the Committee heard 7 groups or individuals including The Honourable Keith Milligan, Minister of Health and Social Services.

On May 27, 1987 in Fredericton, New Brunswick, the Committee heard 4 groups or individuals.

On May 28, 1987 in St. John's, Newfoundland, the Committee heard 16 groups or individuals, including The Honourable Hugh Twomey, Minister of Health, and The Honourable Jim Russell, Minister of Consumer Affairs.

On May 29, 1987 in Halifax, Nova Scotia, the Committee heard 15 groups or individuals.

On June 2, 1987 in Victoria, British Columbia, the Committee heard 23 groups or individuals, including the Minister of Health and Human Resources of the Government of the Yukon, The Honourable Margaret Joe.

On June 3, 1987 in Edmonton, Alberta, the Committee heard 27 groups or individuals.

On June 10, 1987 in Toronto, Ontario, the Committee heard 25 groups or individuals, including the Assistant Deputy Minister for Emergency and Specialized Health Services, Dr. Dennis Psutka.

On June 11, 1987 in Toronto, Ontario, the Committee heard 16 groups or individuals.

On June 12, 1987 in Quebec City, Quebec, the Committee heard 26 groups or individuals.

The Committee could not hold hearings in Whitehorse, Yukon and Yellowknife, N.W.T. because of the restraint of the timetable. However, the Committee invited interested witnesses to appear either in Victoria or Edmonton. Representatives of the Yukon Government and groups from the Northwest Territories accepted this invitation.

The Committee hopes to hold hearings in Ottawa before it presents its final report.

Respectfully submitted,

M. LORNE BONNELL
Chairman

CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

OPPOSITION TO REINSTATEMENT—PRESS CONFERENCE BY POLITICAL PARTY YOUTH REPRESENTATIVES

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, today at 1 p.m. in the National Press Club theatre, under the sponsorship of Senator Hastings, there occurred a press conference which I consider to be of historic importance.

In my memory it marks the first time that the elected heads of the youth federations of all three major political parties have come together for a common purpose.

I am sure that honourable senators will by now have received, or will shortly receive, a letter sent to all members of Parliament. I should like to read into the record the first and last paragraphs:

We are young Canadians, active in the political process, who have come together to express our opposition to the reinstatement of the death penalty. Although we differ on many issues, there are those, crossing all party lines, in which there is clearly a right path and a wrong path to take. While we do not all claim to speak for all those we represent in our respective party organisations, nonetheless, we are allowed, as you are, freedom of conscience and expression as individuals. We agree with the leaders of our parties that the death penalty has no place in the Canadian system of justice.

We urge Canada's Parliament to vote against the reinstatement of the death penalty.

There are two middle paragraphs, which I am sure honourable senators will have read or will want to read. The letter is signed by the President of the Progressive Conservative Youth Federation, Irene Porter; by Jonathan Schneiderman, President of the Young Liberals of Canada; and Elaine Fox, representing the NDP.

I would ask the chamber to recognize the presence of these young people in the gallery.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): We recognize the NDP, even when they don't recognize us!

1987 CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—MESSAGE FROM HOUSE OF COMMONS—DEBATE ON MOTION TO CONCUR—POINT OF ORDER—SPEAKER'S RULING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, before proceeding with the Order of Business, I would like to rule on the point of order raised yesterday by Senator Corbin, regarding Senator Murray's remarks during the debate on the motion to appoint a joint committee on the 1987 Constitutional Accord.

Senator Corbin argued that Senator Murray's remarks about the Senate's decision last week to refer the Accord to Committee of the Whole were contrary to parliamentary practice, insofar as they criticized a decision by the Senate.

I have read the text of Senator Murray's remarks, and the only derogatory allusion I find was the use of the term "majority" in connection to the Senate's decision. Beauchesne is very clear on this in C. 315 of the Fifth Edition of his Parliamentary Rules and Forms.

Senator Murray has acknowledged that he was at fault and has made amends.

As far as Senator Murray's other remarks are concerned, I do not share Senator Corbin's objections, since Senator Murray neither criticized nor attacked the Senate's decision.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: That was an exercise in futility!

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence has the honour to present its second report respecting power to incur special expenses pursuant to the Procedural Guidelines for the Financial Operations of Senate Committees.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and to the Debates of the Senate of this day, and that it form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix "A", p. 1292.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Lafond, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

THE PHILIPPINES

CURRENT SITUATION—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Monday next, June 22, 1987, I shall call the attention of the Senate to the situation in the Philippines.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

SOUTH MORESBY—ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL PARK— REPORTED STATEMENT BY PREMIER—DISCUSSIONS BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PREMIER

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I regret that we do not have yesterday's Hansard on our desks yet, because I wanted to refer to it. However, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate in connection with the matter I raised yesterday concerning South Moresby Island. First, through the Leader of the Government in the Senate, I want to address the Premier of British Columbia, who was quoted in the press as saying that "he does not want to see a part of British Columbia given to those easterners." As a British Columbian and a parliamentarian of long standing, I want to tell all of those present that I regret that statement very much. It is a short-sighted, ridiculous kind of statement.

I also want to tell parliamentarians here and to remind the people of Canada that South Moresby Island is not just any ordinary site or any ordinary part of British Columbia or Canada. South Moresby is considered a world-class heritage site, and we should preserve it not only for all Canadians but for all humanity. It is that kind of site, and the premier should have that kind of vision so that we can gladly enter into meaningful negotiations with the Government of Canada to set it aside not just for the Haida Indians or for Canadians but for all humanity to enjoy.

I wish I had yesterday's Hansard so that I could refer to what the Leader of the Government said. As I recall, he said that the Prime Minister was involved in discussions with the Premier of British Columbia about South Moresby. I refer to another news article in the Toronto Star of June 16 that came out of Vancouver. It says, in reference to Premier Vander Zalm, "Now he wants to speak directly with Prime Minister Brian Mulroney." I think that is a good idea. South Moresby Island is worth every effort we can make to get a deal. I wonder whether the Leader of the Government can enlighten us as to whether discussions have in fact taken place between Premier Vander Zalm and Prime Minister Mulroney?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am reasonably confident of the accuracy of my statement yesterday, to the effect that the matter did come up at one of the meetings that has taken place over the past little while between the Prime Minister and the Premier of British Columbia. Obviously, if the Premier of British Columbia wished to have further conversations with the Prime Minister of Canada on this or any other matter, the door of the Prime Minister of Canada is open.

I might say that the Deputy Prime Minister has had several discussions with the Premier on this matter, and I know that Mr. McMillan, the Minister of the Environment, has also had occasion to discuss the matter with Premier Vander Zalm.

I appreciate the concerns expressed by the honourable senator. I cannot add much to what I said yesterday, except to confirm that the difference between what we regard as a fair and generous offer of the federal government, on the one hand, and the demand of the Government of British Columbia, on the other, is of the order of $100 million or thereabouts, so we are talking about a very considerable gap.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, I do not wish to belabour the point about discussions between the Premier of British Columbia and the Prime Minister. However, I would again ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if there is not some opportunity, or opening in the door, whereby the Prime Minister of our country could again take the matter up with the Premier of British Columbia. It is that important.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I hope my friend does not underestimate the authority of the Deputy Prime Minister—nor, indeed, of the Minister of the Environment—to speak on behalf of the Government of Canada. We have made an offer which would cost the federal treasury $106 million over ten years. That is a fair and generous offer. The lands in question belong to the Government of British Columbia. If the Government of British Columbia prefers logging to protection of the environment, that is their choice, and we really cannot go beyond the fair and generous offer that we have made.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

NUCLEAR-POWERED SUBMARINES—NON-PROLIFERATION TREATY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The white paper on defence proposes the acquisition of nuclear-powered submarines. In the non-proliferation treaty which Canada signed, there is a definite provision that the signatories not sell uranium to any country that would use nuclear-powered vessels. That is a stated government policy. How does the Leader of the Government in the Senate reconcile that provision with what is proposed in the white paper on defence?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not have a prepared note on that matter, but my advice from the Secretary of State for External Affairs is that the decision taken by the government with regard to nuclear submarines is consistent with our obligations under the treaty to which my friend refers.

Senator Bosa: Would the Leader of the Government in the Senate undertake to provide us with a more detailed answer at the next sitting of the Senate, if that is possible?

Senator Murray: I shall make inquiries, honourable senators.

1987 CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD

ESTABLISHMENT OF SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—MESSAGE FROM HOUSE OF COMMONS CONCURRED IN

Leave having been given to proceed with Order No. 8.

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Murray, P.C., seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consider and report on the "1987 Constitutional Accord, signed in Ottawa on June 3, 1987, by the First Ministers of Canada", copies of which were tabled in the Senate and the House of Commons on June 3, 1987;

That twelve Members of the House of Commons and five Members of the Senate be the Members of the Special Joint Committee, such Members on the part of the Senate to be designated no later than seven sitting days after the adoption of this motion;

That the Committee have the power to appoint from among its Members such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings or of proceedings of its sub-committees, pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons;

That the Committee submit its report not later than September 14, 1987, provided that, if the Senate is not sitting, the report will be deemed submitted on the day such report is deposited with the Clerk of the Senate;

That substitution be authorized, for Members from the House of Commons, from a list of alternates to be provided to the Joint Chairmen of the Special Joint Committee by a representative of each party at the first meeting of the Committee, such list of alternates to contain no more than twice the number of Members of the House of Commons who are Members of the Special Joint Committee representing each party in the House;

That the quorum of the Committee be eight Members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented, and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six Members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.—(Honourable Senator Rizzuto).

Hon. Pietro Rizzuto: Honourable senators, yesterday, the Leader of the Government in the Senate moved to accept the invitation to take part in a Special Joint Committee, an invitation extended by the other chamber for the purpose of considering the Meech Lake Constitutional accord.

I asked him two questions on that occasion. The answer to the first was affirmative, that is, three out of five senators would be appointed from this side of the House. The answer to the second question, whether the joint chairman of the Committee would be chosen from among the three senators representing the majority in this chamber was not answered. That is why I preferred to adjourn the debate until today, to give him time to consult and make sure that my request was indeed eminently sensible. Since there would be a joint chairman from the other place, appointed from their majority, the joint chairman from the Senate should also represent the majority.

As for the invitation to take part in a special joint committee, I feel that the participation of this chamber is important in that it would give us a chance to make a contribution as well. I am prepared to support the motion, but I hope my suggestion with respect to the joint chairman is taken into consideration. I am convinced that if we have that assurance, a number of senators would support the motion.

Honourable senators, I am certainly not one of the most eloquent speakers in this chamber, but I have a strong commitment to the issues in a debate on which the future of our country's harmonious unity depends.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, on a point of order. Obviously, I agree totally with the comments made by my colleague, Senator Rizzuto, except where he said, in his preamble, "... the senators on this side of the house."

I have no particular ambition to be a member of the Special Joint Committee, but I know he did not mean to say in his remarks that he wanted to exclude my Liberal colleagues including Senators Corbin, Le Moyne, Hébert, and all the other senators on this side of the House. We often speak, mistakenly, of "that side of the house", leaving out the—

Hon. Jacques Hébert: —the best!

Senator Thériault: —some of the best, at least those who like me, think of themselves as "Liberal" senators.

Senator Rizzuto: Honourable senators, I agree. I think it is a habit we have in the Senate of saying: "on this side of the house", in referring to Liberal senators.

If the honourable senator will allow me, I will gladly make the correction. In any case, I meant this to refer to Liberal senators, and certainly not just those on this side of the chamber. I know there are many Liberal senators on the other side of this chamber as well.

In any case, I think our colleagues have all understood.

[English]

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, I wish to interject for a moment, before the debate on this motion is closed, just to give honourable senators some idea of my preoccupation since this matter came before us yesterday.

I was really quite impressed by Senator Frith's remarks on this matter. That is not a condition or attitude of mind that I am overly wont to fall into. I think that we are, on the surface of the matter, really dealing with something that is of a procedural nature, whereas, in fact, underlying that, and far more fundamental, we are dealing with a very substantive matter involving the existence of and the role of the Senate in the Parliament of Canada.

In my period in this chamber, I have seen a certain evolution take place in this house. It has gone from being a relatively independent, relatively deliberative body, to assuming more and more a role as a counterpart of the House of Commons. In other words, in procedure and attitudes, it is becoming more consistent with those of the House of Commons, and, in effect, during that evolution the Senate has come to be rather a more pale reflection of party loyalties and personal loyalties than of independent opinions.

I believe that that evolution has brought with it the increasing hype in media and elsewhere that we are a group of "hacks, flacks and bagmen," as Senator Frith mentioned yesterday.

I would like to remind honourable senators that we have had an invitation from the House of Commons. The word "invitation" has a friendly overtone, but I would like you to remember that this is the invitation of the spider to the fly. Once again, by adopting this resolution, we will be getting stuck in the web: A joint committee in which the Senate would be a small minority divided amongst itself. It will merely become a method of expressing the views of the majority of the House of Commons members.

Be that as it may, we, as a Senate, will have been co-opted into the proceedings of the House of Commons. You might very well say, "Why, that is perfectly all right. We are going to have our own committee." Assuming that our own committee report is different or distinct from that of the joint committee, we are going to look like fools. We are going to look ridiculous, and the public can point to us and say, "Well, how can you come up with a report like that when you had members on the joint committee?" In a joint committee there is no possibility of a dissident group writing a separate report.

By adopting this resolution, we will have been co-opted by the House of Commons. We will, once again, have denigrated our role in Parliament, and we will be ridiculed by the press and the public if our own deliberations should differ from those of the other place.

Therefore, honourable senators, I do not have to invite you to judge whether I oppose this resolution. I do so in the interests of perpetuating and, hopefully, enhancing the image and the individuality of this institution as part of the Parliament of Canada.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

● (1420)

Hon. Hartland de M. Molson: Honourable senators, I did not think at the outset that I would step in where angels fear to tread, but since the Meech Lake accord of 1987 has been made public, I have been concerned, as an anglophone Quebecois and as a representative of a minority in Quebec, about the effect that this accord will have. My main difficulty, of course, is in common with that of many who have already discussed the accord—it is that the meaning of some of the terms used is quite unclear. They are not defined, and until they are defined, I, quite frankly, do not know what I am supposed to do in terms of representing those people in Quebec whom I think it is my responsibility to represent.

Apart from that, in this case, as I see it, the amendment of the Constitution now requires a resolution of the Senate. I do not believe that a joint committee permits such a resolution to come forward clearly. I was impressed by the speech made yesterday by Senator Frith. I thought his reasoning was good, and I was particularly impressed when he said that he was speaking as a senator—not as a deputy leader, not as a Liberal, not even as a Conservative, and not even as an Independent—which I found to be a very refreshing change in this chamber, and I congratulate him on it.

Senator Flynn: It is not because he said it that it was true.

Senator Molson: Well, that is not a discussion I will embark upon.

Be that as it may, I feel that the Senate should present its own resolution. I think that its own committee should deal with the matter. I do not think that a minority representation in a joint committee answers the needs of the Senate, as has just been said by my colleague, Senator Lang. For that reason, I cannot support the motion to join with the House of Commons in a joint committee, and I support a motion for a separate Senate committee, be it a Committee of the Whole or otherwise.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, I do not have much to add to this discussion, but I would simply like to underscore the Senate's separate, distinct identity when we are dealing with constitutional affairs. The Senate has regional responsibilities. We all support the Meech Lake proposals in principle. The only difficulty here, it seems to me, is that we must make sure that any ambiguities in the finished document are reduced to a minimum, or as much as they possibly can be. Even if the invitation from the House of Commons had proposed equal representation of the Senate and the House, this still would not have answered the necessity for the Senate to be seen to act and to be able to act as a separate and distinct identity.

The other aspect of the proposal that makes me uneasy is the television coverage. It has been said that the Senate is a workshop, that it is not a stage. The House of Commons is in a different category. The members of Parliament have their electorate to get a message across to, and the television coverage ensures that there is a clear picture of what the House of Commons is doing. If the Senate is actually a workshop and has a committee of its own, it will put expert questions from some of the undoubted expertise that there is in this chamber, I am afraid to say it, but some of the questions and some of the answers from our expert witnesses are going to be boring to most of the audience who will be watching. That is why we are a workshop, and that is why, if there is a legislative chamber anywhere in this country that is objective, it is the Senate of Canada. On this occasion I feel that it will be non-partisan.

Let us have a workshop-type atmosphere, not a public relations exercise. We wish the House of Commons well in their responsibilities; let us do our work in our responsible senatorial way to the best of our ability. I am afraid that I cannot support the invitation from the other place.

Hon. Louis-J. Robichaud: Honourable senators, this is a delicate situation in which we find ourselves. It is a delicate issue not only here in the Senate but also outside of the Senate, because the solution that will evolve from all of these discussions in the House of Commons, the various provincial legislatures and the Senate will be extremely important for decades and possibly centuries ahead. The more we study the matter, the better it will be, and the better off our children and our children's children will be.

I do not object to the Chamber of Commerce, the Board of Trade, the Rotary Club, or any given organizations—universities throughout the country—studying this matter. The more people who get involved, the better it will be.

We have been studying this problem of the Constitution for decades now, and I have been involved in this matter since July of 1960, during the ten years that I was premier of my province. It was a delicate matter then; it is a delicate matter today. After all, 1960 is only 27 years ago; it is not a long period when we consider the life of a country. I am willing to postpone the final decision until after September 14, if we have to, provided that we have good results.

Last Thursday we took a vote in the Senate to decide whether we should constitute ourselves into a Committee of the Whole and pursue the study that was started many years ago. "Why not?", I thought. I voted in favour of that resolution because I thought it was a good one. I voted for it because of what I heard from my leader in the Senate, Senator MacEachen. I will quote a portion of what he said on page 1218 of the Debates of the Senate of Thursday, June 11, 1987. He said:

[Senator Bell.]

The only difference is that in this case it would be a Committee of the Whole whereas in the former case it was a special committee of the Senate. However, in both cases the Senate will have conducted its own inquiry and will have left the door open, if it wishes, to participate with and assist the House of Commons.

That makes sense to me. On the basis of that sentence, I voted in favour of constituting ourselves into a Committee of the Whole to study—during the summer months if need be, but later in the year, and maybe next year—the whole matter of a revision of the Constitution. I voted for it last Thursday, and today I am voting for a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Robichaud: I understand that there will be more Conservative members from the House of Commons on the committee than there will be Liberals, but that is normal: There are more people there than there are here, and there are more Conservatives there than there are Liberals here. That is okay; I can live with that. I can live with the 12-5 proportion.

Senator Perrault: Not for long!

Senator Robichaud: I can live with it, but it will not tie the hands of the Liberals or the Conservatives in the other place. I must say, with all the courtesy at my command, that I disagree with my colleague, Senator Lang, when he says that there will be no opportunity for some senators on the joint committee to express their own views in one way or another. I do not think they will be in that position.

● (1430)

The report that will come from the joint committee does not necessarily have to be unanimous. So, there could be disagreement there. If the Liberal senators on the committee are not happy, they will find a forum to express their views—at least, I hope they will.

I know that we have made tremendous progress over the years in connection with the Constitution and the Charter of Rights. But what has emanated from Meech Lake is far from being perfect. Let us make it as close as possible to perfection. Let us form ourselves into a Committee of the Whole, and let us participate with the House of Commons in a joint committee.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Murray speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, our colleague, Senator Robichaud, put it very well. The arguments that have been used by Senator Frith and Senator Lang, among others, against our participation in this joint committee could have been used, and could be used, against our participation in any joint committee. The fact that we will be outnumbered by members of the House of Commons is of little importance. The history of these joint committees is that honourable senators have made a very useful and important contribution to the deliberation of those committees. I had the honour, during a previous Parliament, of being co-chairman of the Joint Committee on Official Languages.

Senator Guay: When you were a member of the Opposition.

Senator Murray: When I was a member of the Opposition; that is correct. I have seen the work of the joint committee which sat on the Constitution during the 1981-82 exercise, and I recall very well the distinguished contribution made by a number of honourable senators on this side, as well as by Senator Austin, by our former colleague, Senator Goldenberg, and others who were here at the time. So I would embark upon this venture, in partnership with our friends from the House of Commons, with every confidence in the ability of honourable senators to make an important, perhaps even decisive, contribution to those deliberations.

Our honourable friend, Senator Bell, in her remarks concerning television, seemed to be anticipating a motion that Senator Frith has already placed before us and which will be coming up for debate in a couple of days—namely, a motion to televise the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole. At that time she will have an opportunity to express her views again on that matter and, if necessary, to vote against televising the Committee of the Whole.

I had not intended on this occasion—and I hope that largely I can resist the temptation—to discuss the Meech Lake accord, or the Langevin accord, or the constitutional resolution in detail or substance today. Nevertheless, I was struck again by the expressions of concern on the part of Senator Molson, speaking as he does as a member of the anglophone community of Quebec. I tell him—and I draw the attention of honourable senators to the fact—that in the interpretative clauses that are proposed in the present constitutional resolution, all 11 governments, for the first time in the history of our country, have committed themselves to protecting what I would call the linguistic duality of this country. So, in that respect alone, the situation of the anglophone minority in Quebec is probably better today than it was before the Meech Lake accord.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You are going to resist now. You are going to start resisting the temptation before we call you to order.

Senator Murray: I made an exception in the concerns expressed, and I am sure that Senator Molson will not object to my taking a minute to address myself—

Senator Frith: I do not intend to speak for Senator Molson—

Senator Murray: I hope not.

Senator Frith: I am speaking for myself—and you are out of order.

Senator Murray: Senator Frith is speaking not as a Liberal, not as a Conservative, not as an Independent—

Senator Frith: And you, on the other hand, are speaking out of order.

Senator Murray: I am sorry that I seem to have got under the honourable senator's skin. I was addressing myself, I had hoped in a non-contentious and non-controversial way, to a concern expressed by our colleague, Senator Molson. I do want to make one further comment about the state of the situation, about the concerns of the people of the community to which he belongs in Quebec, and it is this: It seems to me that the important achievement of this accord—

Senator Frith: Are you closing the debate on the Meech Lake accord?

Senator Murray: —which is to gain Quebec's assent to a constitutional resolution, is very important to all Quebecers, including the anglophone minority in that province. I have said on many occasions that the fact that Quebec had not assented to a constitutional accord was a source of serious potential instability in this country, and that, surely, would not have been in the interests of the anglophone minority, or anyone else in this country. So I would hope that he and others would in time—

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I have resisted the temptation to call the Leader of the Government formally to order in closing the debate on a motion for a joint resolution; but, like him, I have been unable to resist it any longer. He is out of order, in closing the debate on a motion to concur in a joint committee, by introducing these comments about the accord itself—all of them very defensive about the accord, clearly political and totally irrelevant to the question of a joint committee.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, let me simply say that I hope that in time Senator Molson will come to celebrate this important achievement, as ten premiers—

Senator Frith: I ask His Honour the Speaker to call him to order.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, let me simply say that the constitutional resolution that we are now about to refer to a joint committee has the support of ten premiers, three national party leaders, a good 51 per cent of the population of Canada, and more than 60 per cent of the people of Quebec. That is an historic achievement, and an achievement to be celebrated by all Quebecers.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: This has been an unpaid commercial by the Progressive Conservative Party, bootlegged into a motion for a joint committee.

Senator Murray: I would have hoped that the honourable senator would be able to contain himself for a while—

Senator Frith: Don't count on it!

Senator Murray: However, if he wishes, he will have the opportunity—

Senator Frith: I cannot speak now. You are closing the debate.

Senator Murray: You will have plenty of opportunities—

Senator Frith: So will you. Why can't you wait?

Hon. Senators: Order, order!

Senator Murray: He will have plenty of opportunities to express what I gather is his ferocious opposition to this constitutional resolution.

Senator Frith: Order, order!

[Translation]

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I may say that I greatly appreciate Senator Rizzuto's commitment to the process, if not to the Constitutional accord itself. I very much appreciate his comments. What he said is very important, considering the key position he occupies within his political group and the special perspective he brings to these issues.

I am no more in a position today than I was yesterday to make any commitment as to the choice of the committee's two joint chairmen. I think we should let the procedure take its normal course and leave the appointment of the joint chairman to the leadership on both sides and to the members of the Joint Committee.

I noted with interest, however, the availability of Senator Thériault and I wish to thank him.

[English]

The good news from yesterday's debate is that Senator Frith, in his own words, is not challenging the Right Honourable John Turner. The bad news is that he is not speaking as a Liberal. Senator Godfrey rose to issue his own disclaimer. He is not challenging Mr. Turner. Senator van Roggen rose with, I believe, the same thing in mind.

● (1440)

Senator van Roggen: Such things are never attributed to me.

Senator Murray: I want to give all honourable senators on that side the opportunity, in turn, if they wish, to say that they are not challenging their leader. If anybody wishes to do so, I invite him or her to do so immediately. We could have a show of hands.

Senator Frith: Come on! You are closing the debate.

Senator Murray: All those who are not challenging the leader, kindly raise your hands. Those who are challenging the leader, raise your hands.

Senator Frith: What an abuse of courtesy.

Senator Denis: Question!

Senator Frith: Come on! Let's have the question.

Senator MacEachen: Order!

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Murray: Senator Frith also stated yesterday—

Senator MacEachen: Order!

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Order! Senator Lang is rising on a point of order.

Senator Lang: Honourable senators, I think that the remarks that have been flying around this chamber in the past few minutes completely abrogate our rules of conduct in this house. We will lose our whole sense of decorum if challenges and remarks of this kind are hurled about by the Leader of the Government. I ask that honourable senators maintain what semblance of order we may have left.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Senator Lang pronounces himself as satisfied with the arguments made by Senator Frith yesterday. I am not so satisfied with those arguments, and I am attempting to address myself to them. He has gone in the opposite direction to that taken by Senator MacEachen a few days before. Senator MacEachen had pointed to the precedent of 1978 in which there had been not only a joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons but also a committee of this Senate dealing with constitutional matters.

Senator Frith: Under the previous amending formula.

Senator Murray: Under the previous amending formula, but it was Senator MacEachen who made the point, and it was Senator MacEachen who pointed to the precedent. Clearly, he was laying the ground work for an affirmative vote today on the creation of this joint committee.

Senator Frith: That is true.

Senator Murray: I repeat, the argument that Senator Frith has made about being outnumbered in a joint committee would apply to any joint committee in which we might be invited to participate. I have never heard him or any other senator make those arguments in respect of any other joint committee.

I would have preferred to have the joint committee alone, and not the Committee of the Whole. However, we have to make the best of the situation that is before us. The Senate decided the other day on a Committee of the Whole. We are now in receipt of an invitation from the House of Commons. Obviously, there will be some duplication of effort. That is not only quite possible, it is even probable. There will be some inconvenience. That inconvenience will fall largely on witnesses who will feel obliged to ask to appear before both committees. The inconvenience will fall heavier on the minority party in this house, the government party, which is outnumbered more than two to one. However, we are quite prepared to accept that invitation and to participate in the work of this joint committee.

Finally, I appeal to honourable senators not to create unnecessary confrontation—

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Frith: Only necessary confrontations, no unnecessary ones!

Senator Murray: —with the elected chamber, and to accept their invitation to participate in this joint committee, if I may borrow a phrase, with honour and enthusiasm.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Murray, seconded by the Honourable Senator Doody:

That the Senate do unite with the House of Commons in the appointment of a Special Joint Committee to consider and report on the "1987 Constitutional Accord, signed in Ottawa on June 3, 1987, by the First Ministers of Canada", copies of which were tabled in the Senate and the House of Commons on June 3, 1987.

That twelve Members of the House of Commons and five Members of the Senate be the Members of the Special Joint Committee, such Members on the part of the Senate to be designated no later than seven sitting days after the adoption of this motion;

That the Committee have the power to appoint from among its Members such sub-committees as may be deemed advisable, and to delegate to such sub-committees all or any of their powers except the power to report directly to the Senate;

That the Committee have power to sit during sittings and adjournments of the Senate;

That the Committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, and to examine witnesses and to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the Committee;

That the Committee be empowered to authorize television and radio broadcasting, as it deems appropriate, of any or all of its proceedings or of proceedings of its sub-committees, pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons;

That the Committee submit its report not later than September 14, 1987, provided that, if the Senate is not sitting, the report will be deemed submitted on the day such report is deposited with the Clerk of the Senate;

That substitution be authorized, for Members from the House of Commons, from a list of alternates to be provided to the Joint Chairmen of the Special Joint Committee by a representative of each party at the first meeting of the Committee, such list of alternates to contain no more than twice the number of Members of the House of Commons who are Members of the Special Joint Committee representing each party in the House;

That the quorum of the Committee be eight Members, whenever a vote, resolution or other decision is taken, so long as both Houses are represented, and that the Joint Chairmen be authorized to hold meetings, to receive evidence and authorize the printing thereof, when six

Members are present so long as both Houses are represented; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House accordingly.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators who are in favour of the motion please say, "yea"?

Some Hon. Senators: Yea.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Will those honourable senators who are against the motion please say, "nay"?

Some Hon. Senators: Nay.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: In my opinion the "yeas" have it.

And two honourable senators having risen:

The Hon. the Speaker: Please call in the senators.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE BENEFIT ENTITLEMENT ADJUSTMENTS (PENSION PAYMENTS) BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson moved the third reading of Bill C-50, respecting the treatment of pension payments in determining certain unemployment insurance benefit entitlements and to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PRIVATE BILL

WINDSOR-DETROIT TUNNEL—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Cotreau, for the second reading of the Bill S-11, An Act to authorize the City of Windsor to acquire, operate and dispose of the Windsor-Detroit Tunnel.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, since I understand there is some urgency in this matter, I have no wish to delay this bill which was presented by Senator Frith. On the other hand, I am reluctant to let it go through without some reference to committee.

Senator Flynn: It has to be sent to committee.

[The Hon. the Speaker.]

Senator Doody: I understand that there is some suggestion that rules 93 and 95 should be suspended to facilitate the passage of the bill.

I had undertaken to discuss this matter with some people who have a far greater knowledge of this than I. However, I have not had that opportunity, so I would be very reluctant to let the bill pass without either a committee hearing or at least standing the order long enough to get some information from the other side.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I have leave to make a comment without closing the debate?

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Frith: We looked up some precedents and found that there are a number of precedents for suspending rule 95, which provides that when a bill is referred to committee, the committee must not deal with it for a week.

We could find no precedents for suspending rule 93. Perhaps when Senator Doody is considering what action we might take tomorrow, we should consider simply suspending rule 95, for which, as I say, there are many precedents, and sending the bill to committee, but allowing the committee to deal with it immediately rather than having it wait for a week. Perhaps he would include that in his considerations.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I have no problem with that. I would be agreeable to the bill's being sent to committee today and suspending rule 95. I simply want to make sure that interested people have an opportunity to consider the content of the bill. I am sure that Senator Frith is satisfied with the content of the bill, but I would like to be sure that we know what we are doing.

Senator Frith: In fairness, I have already pointed out that, although the bill should not excite controversy, the whole process is not without controversy, so I think that is the better course for us to take.

Therefore, honourable senators, with respect to Bill S-11, I move that we suspend rule 95. If that is agreeable, I will then ask leave to move that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I believe a better way to proceed would be to give it second reading now, and then that motion should follow.

Senator Frith: I agree.

Senator Flynn: Do we have the opinion of legal counsel as to the propriety of the bill from a legal viewpoint?

Senator Frith: There is a rule that requires that the bill be examined, and I believe there is reference to the Examiner of Bills. I understand that was done, as required, before the bill was introduced for second reading.

Senator Flynn is quite right in that we should have second reading, and then, when the bill is sent to committee, we should ask for a suspension of rule 95. I believe that is the procedure that has been followed in the past.

Therefore, honourable senators, I commend second reading of Bill S-11, to authorize the City of Windsor to acquire, operate and dispose of the Windsor-Detroit Tunnel.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and, with leave, I move that rule 95 be suspended with respect to this reference.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, before this motion is agreed to, may I ask the sponsor of the bill whether it will be assured that those who oppose the bill will have notice of this referral so they can appear before our committee?

Senator Frith: Yes, indeed, they ought to have that.

Senator McElman: Then, I have no objection.

Motion agreed to and bill referred to Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs.

APPROPRIATION BILL NO. 3, 1987-88

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody moved the second reading of Bill C-65, for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1988.

He said: Honourable senators, I will just take a moment to introduce this bill on second reading. It is the Appropriation Act No. 3, 1987-88 which provides for the release of the balance of the Main Estimates for 1987-88, amounting to some $27.4 billion.

These estimates were tabled in the Senate on March 10, 1987, and referred immediately to the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. These estimates were discussed in committee with the President of the Treasury Board and his officials on April 9, 1987.

Honourable senators, I have no hesitation in assuring you that this bill is in the standard form and that it has no secrets or surprises. If honourable senators require additional information, I will be pleased to try to provide it, but at this point I would simply say that this bill is based on the Main Estimates, and I commend it to you for second reading.

I have with me the total of the estimates tabled to date for 1987-88 and the supply to date for 1987-88 in both official languages. It might be helpful if these were appended to the proceedings today for the information of senators who may wish to speak or ask questions.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For tables, see Appendix "B", p. 1295.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, of course, we are not going to refuse the government supply, but I am going to ask that the debate be adjourned for one day and that we deal with it tomorrow. I simply want to have an opportunity to look at the proceedings in committee to see if there is anything we should highlight as we pass the bill. I certainly do not do that with the purpose in mind of defeating the bill.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

BELL CANADA BILL

ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill C-13, An Act respecting the reorganization of Bell Canada.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it is the intention of Senator Kelly to introduce this bill for second reading tomorrow. With your permission, we would ask that the order stand in the name of Senator Kelly.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators.

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands in name of Senator Kelly.

CANADIAN EXPLORATION AND DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES PROGRAM BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. R. James Balfour moved the second reading of Bill C-59, to provide for payments in respect of exploration for or development of lands for the production of hydrocarbons in Canada other than coal.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to be able to begin in the Senate today the process of discussing a bill to establish the Canadian Exploration and Development Incentives Program. The program, which the Minister of Energy outlined in Edmonton on March 25, is of great importance to the Canadian west and to our economy as a whole. The financial support provided for in the bill could give rise to new investment of up to $1 billion in the oil and gas resource development sector.

The Canadian Exploration and Development Incentives Program is the result of constructive dialogue between government and representatives of the oil and gas industry. It is specific insofar as it targets precise activities that have been deemed most suitable for ensuring industry recovery, and it is global because its objectives clearly locate the Canadian energy sector within international markets and our economic future.

It recognizes that oil and gas companies are ultimately responsible for decision-making on exploration and development work on the basis of economic and geological considerations rather than political imperatives. The government will not decide what company will do the work, nor will it dictate in what region of the country the exploration and development activities are to take place, although clearly the western sedimentary basin will be the logical location for most of the exploration activity generated by this legislation.

To ensure that the program is implemented in the same spirit of cooperation and coordination that accompanied its formulation, the government plans to administer the program mainly from Calgary, where most of our oil and gas industries are located, although Saskatchewan is being considered as a location for a satellite office.

I believe that it would be useful if I took a moment to describe how the bill under consideration fits in with the approach set in motion on June 30, 1986, and with the government's overall energy strategy since September, 1984.

In the Western Accord signed in the fall of 1984, the government did away with the petroleum and gas revenue tax, thereby freeing up substantial sums of money for re-investment in the Canadian oil and gas industry. This legislation will provide about $350 million additional a year in direct assistance to the industry. It began on April 1, 1987, and will provide cash incentives of one third of exploration and development expenses for companies anywhere in Canada, up to a maximum of $10 million in spending per company in a given year.

We are confident that CEDIP will increase considerably the industry's productivity and cash flow. We also expect that it will lead to more than $1 billion in additional investment, and up to 20,000 person-years of new employment. The Government of Canada introduced CEDIP because it was concerned about the uncertainty of the petroleum economy in western Canada and, indeed, around the world. It feels that CEDIP goes directly to the heart of the problem.

I should point out, however, that CEDIP is still a vehicle, a conduit, that is meant to assist in recovery. It is not a panacea, and it will not be all things to all people. We strongly believe in the strength and resiliency of the private sector and the marketplace. Energy production and consumption should preferably be established and maintained by free market forces, to the maximum extent possible

[Senator Balfour.]

The collapse of oil prices, which began in 1986, was, to a large extent, the result of a test of will between a number of producers in the OPEC cartel. The excessive overproduction that caused the price per barrel to drop to $10 or less was a brutal reminder of the uncertainty of international oil markets. Despite the price increases to $18 per barrel or more in recent months and the relative stability of oil markets, factors that contribute to instability, such as the strained situation in the Persian Gulf, remain.

Price instability has a direct impact on our industry and on the oil and natural gas producing regions. Last year over 25,000 jobs were lost in Alberta alone. Everyone in Canada lost, because the bloodletting affected not only a vital industry but also our economic development and social objectives across Canada.

From this standpoint, honourable senators, it is clear that the specific measures provided in the Canadian Exploration and Development Incentives Program aim primarily at counteracting the disastrous situation in which the oil and gas industry finds itself as a result of the plunge in world oil prices. It does not, however, attempt to control the market.

Our desire to maintain the fundamental link between producers and consumers remains, because we believe that it is through links like these that the oil and gas industry, the Canadian west and Canada as a whole, will all serve their best interests.

In 1920 the Western Independent reported these comments from a great western Canadian, Henry Wise Wood:

Water cannot rise above its source, neither can social progress rise higher than the level of the citizenship of the people.

The traditional meaning of citizenship is "belonging" or "membership". I believe that it is in the existence of genuine links based on common interest that those who live in all our regions will be able fully and dynamically to express their membership in Canada as a whole.

Honourable senators, I urge speedy passage of this bill.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I rise to say a few words about Bill C-59. No one could help but look at this bill and wonder what the government is going to do next in terms of resurrecting programs that it threw out only two and a half years ago or so. Bill C-59, of course, which outlines the Canadian Exploration and Development Incentives Program, has in it almost the same terms and conditions that were applicable to the Petroleum Incentives Program. I do not have any disagreement with what Senator Balfour has just said in introducing the bill, but I think that he, on behalf of his party, should at least have had the decency to admit plagiarism. I am sure that both he and Senator Baroote, particularly, would have wanted the opportunity to come before the Senate in ashes and sackcloth to admit that all of those bad things they said about the National Energy Program they didn't really mean, because now they are bringing in a program that is exactly the same.

I agree with Senator Balfour that we should get on with passing this bill, even though it modifies and restricts—really just cheapens—the Petroleum Incentives Program. But I am really tempted to suggest to Senator Balfour that we should keep it here a day or two, because Senator Baroote is not present this afternoon, and I know that he would want to say a few words and to swallow all of those mean things he had to say about the National Energy Program, because here it is back again!

This bill really makes a mockery out of the statements made by the then Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, Ms. Pat Carney, about how she was going to destroy and throw out past policies. The government had some great ideas then about what it was going to substitute for the National Energy Program when it was dismantled. They said they were going to conduct a study; they had some new philosophy as to how the gas and oil industry ought to be administered by the federal government. Now, at least a year and a half later, they come back to resurrect the Petroleum Incentives Program. It is really sad that all of those people in the western industry had to go through that pain and suffering, yet, the government cannot come up with anything better than this.

Honourable senators, the situation is even worse than that, because the present Minister of Energy was in Calgary last weekend to launch what the Calgary Herald calls a "policy quest". Although I am not sure whether these are quotations taken from the minister, I will read from the article entitled "Masse Opens Policy Quest Here Sunday", which describes what he did.

Although Masse has stressed that avoiding a repeat of the hotly-contested NEP ranks high in his priorities, it is no accident that Alberta oil men are in a small minority on his advisory panel.

● (1530)

Obviously, with all 21 members from Alberta in the Conservative ranks, they still do not know how they want to run a national energy program; they have to set up an advisory committee with a small minority of people from the gas and oil industry. That is what the minister is doing.

It also states that:

He also described oil and gas production as over-emphasized by past energy policies, and has set his sights on a policy covering all the bases from electrical power planning to protection of wildlife and the environment.

So the gas and oil industry will be degraded some more by this inquiry that the minister launched on Sunday.

I want to read one or two other paragraphs. One paragraph states:

The minister and his aides have indicated it is also no accident that the government is being vague about what it expects to come out of the inquiry.

Honourable senators, what is clear is that they do not know what they want to come out of the inquiry. They are not even sure that they want the energy—that is, the gas and oil—sectors to have a major undertaking. So, we will have to wait for another 18 months or so before we find out what this government really wants by way of a national energy program.

Why I find that so strange, honourable senators, is that two or three years ago they knew what was wrong with everything, and they were going to repair the National Energy Program. Now they finally come to admit that they really did not know what they were talking about, and they have revived the program that was there before in a cheapened and contracted condition.

Honourable senators, there are a number of things that need to be explained in Bill C-59. First is the definition of a person vis-à-vis a corporation and how that is done with respect to certain aspects of the Income Tax Act. I noticed that in clause 6 and in clauses 8, 9 and 10 of Bill C-59 there are some explanations that are extremely complicated in relating what is expected to happen with the administration of this legislation and, indeed, the Income Tax Act. I understand what the reasons are: They pertain to prohibiting a number of persons from dividing themselves into more than one entity so that they can circumvent the limits that are set out in this bill.

I hope that the sponsor of this bill will be able to give us a more detailed explanation of what the consequences are of the various elections that are available and described in clause 8(2), and also in the flow-through shares provision in agreements that are made between a number of persons and, in some cases, corporations.

Honourable senators, there is another serious weakness in this bill. While it contains some reference to marine or ocean-floor drilling—which I suppose could apply to the east coast or to the Beaufort—the limits on it are such that not one well can be drilled. It has a $10 million limit, one third of which is what the incentive will pay, but anyone who has studied this knows that you cannot drill any wells offshore for $10 million. Most of those wells which are offshore the east coast are in the neighbourhood of $30 million, $40 million or $50 million while they are doing exploration work. While they are somewhat less expensive for the development drilling that is necessary to prove the asset, $10 million does not allow you to drill one well.

I do not understand why the government is taking the position that they do not need to be involved in that as far as incentives are concerned. I know that there are some other programs, such as a 25 per cent deduction or tax credit, for some things. I recently checked with some companies in Calgary that have been active in the offshore drilling in Hibernia and other places off the east coast. They tell me that this bill, along with all of the incentives that have been announced before, is insufficient for any Canadian companies to get back to and be active in that drilling.

One of the things that it is difficult for me to understand is that when some of the witnesses were before the Senate committee, they made it clear that there are a number of discoveries off the east coast that are known. The seismicographic data that has been gathered identified where they might be; there has been sufficient exploratory drilling into those seismic spots to indicate that there are some good prospects for developing a field. What was said over and over again is that unless there is a change in government policy, there is no Canadian company—except Petro-Canada—that can drill out those fields. They told us clearly that they need to have an additional development drilling program in order to prove up the asset so that the financial institutions, particularly the banks, will regard it as an asset on which they would finance those things which lead to putting in a production facility. But there is nothing in this bill that will improve that situation at all.

So, I wondered if there were some programs in place that had been announced before that dealt with the financial problem of Canadian companies trying to bring that oil into production. That is why I checked with companies in Calgary, but they said, “No, there is nothing in place that will correct that.” I cannot believe that the government does not understand that. Why do they not understand that if you are to find several hundred million dollars in credit to put together the financing necessary for a production project off the east coast that those companies have to do enough development drilling to persuade the financial institutions to lend them the money? The big multinational companies like Exxon and several others have enough resources to do it, but, outside of Petro-Canada, there is no Canadian company that is not controlled by one of the multinationals that has sufficient financing to move at all. It seems to me that the President of Husky—which was one of the major players off the east coast—told us that they could not go back and drill in their areas unless the price of oil returned to something over $28 per barrel. I would like to make the argument—but I will not do it today—that that will probably not happen for many years. What is more, he said they would have to know that the price would stay up there long enough for them to do the development drilling in their fields, install the production facilities, which are enormously expensive, and then start to sell the oil. But the government does not seem to understand that at all. So what will be the consequence? If this bill is passed to take care of Canada’s future oil resources and production, it will, in effect, do nothing.

So I hope that the government will come back with another program that will make that possible. We may find some significant reserves of oil in the sedimentary basin of western Canada, but the prospect of that happening is going down all the time because of the lack of drilling until now. The oil industry has not found what it calls an “elephant”—that is, a large field—for many years. I am not saying that it will not do so, but it is unlikely, because most of the area in that sedimentary basin has been explored.

That leads me to suggest that Canada’s future requirements will be met by bringing into production some of the oil deposits which we know exist off the east coast—that is, Hibernia and several others—those from offshore in the Beaufort, and those from the heavy oil and tar sands in northeastern Alberta.

[Senator Olson.]

However, this bill does nothing to bring forward any of that kind of production.

In Canada our production of oil goes down by about 100,000 barrels per day every year. That is the decrease in the potential production that is going on from the western sedimentary basin. It means that we need a new plant two thirds the size of Syncrude, which is one of the largest in the world, to be brought on production each year if we are simply to keep up with the level of Canadian production that we have enjoyed in 1986 and 1987.

There is nothing in this bill, except perhaps a few in-fill drilling wells; but so far as putting in the processing plant, this bill does not provide for that—and it certainly does not provide for the kind of incentives that are needed to bring into production any of the offshore oil.

I would like to conclude by suggesting to the sponsor of the bill that it does not do very much for the industry. It might help a few people in the service industry to get some activity going again, and to get some cash flowing, but it does not go any distance to enable Canada to maintain its level of self-sufficiency in oil production.

It is fairly disappointing that after all this time the best that the government could come up with was a cheapened version of the program that was in place when it took office. It is really sad, but that is about the kindest thing that I can say about Bill C-59.

No doubt Senator Balfour will be closing the debate, and I will not be able to speak again. I wonder whether the honourable senator would be willing to give us some further detailed explanation of what is involved in the flow-through shares referred to in clauses 8, 9 and 10. If so, I would have no objection to the bill moving through all stages without being referred to committee.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: I wish to inform honourable senators that if the Honourable Senator Balfour speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading of this bill.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, I should like to take Senator Olson’s questions as notice. I would prefer to prepare a careful response to his questions with respect to the various clauses of the bill. So, I will simply adjourn the debate, unless any other honourable senator wishes to speak at this time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Balfour, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

REGIONAL VICAR FOR CANADA OF THE PRELATURE OF THE HOLY CROSS AND OPUS DEI—SECOND READING—DEBATE
CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bélisle, seconded by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, for the second reading of the Bill S-7, An Act to incorporate the Regional Vicar for Canada of the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei.—(Honourable Senator Corbin.)

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, if I understood correctly, when they spoke to the principle of the bill aimed at making the Regional Vicar of Opus Dei into a single-person corporation, Senators Hébert and Le Moyne would have preferred that the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei did not even exist.

I fail to see how the opposition of my honourable colleagues might even slow down the activities and expansion of an organization established as a personal prelature. Whether we vote for or against this bill on second reading, the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei will not disappear overnight or next year. In that respect therefore, let us be realistic: practically nothing will have changed in the modus operandi of the holy mafia.

Only a law making the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei illegal in Canada might completely mollify its most dedicated opponents. And yet there is no guarantee that a Supreme Court of Canada interpretation of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms would uphold the legislator's initiative.

I do not think I am mistaken when I say that precious few Canadians are prepared to endorse Opus Dei. This can be explained by the fact that they do not know the prelature or, if they do, they do not have anything against its secret methods and character. As well, very few politicians are prepared to rubber stamp the incorporation application of the Regional Vicar for Canada without first asking for specific background information on his operations.

It is indeed a matter of incorporating a person, but not just anybody if we consider what he represents. What a wonderful camouflage! Fortunately we still have bishops in Canada who spotted the subterfuge and the danger to their flock, and would have prevented these people from setting foot in their diocese. Canon law empowers them to do just that. After all, is one of Opus Dei objectives not to rescue a pastoral which they view as being bankrupt, even if to achieve this end they must resort to ways and means which certain bishops simply could not knowingly approve?

[English]

Opus Dei would be able, as it now does, to pursue its activities in Canada, even if the Senate refused to proceed with the bill. It would be "business as usual" for Opus Dei, just as if Reverend Haddock's petition to incorporate had never been received. So what can one hope to accomplish by turning the bill down?

Strictly speaking, defeat of the bill at second reading, or at any other stage, changes practically nothing for the regional vicar, except that his management of Opus Dei's business, whatever it involves, would perhaps be somewhat cumbersome. But, on the other hand, he has managed pretty well up to now, I am told secretly.

• (1550)

If this bill eventually received Royal Assent, the Reverend Haddock, by virtue of our legislative will, not through the mysterious operation of the spirit, would become two: the personal, physical Reverend Haddock and his vicariously incorporated self.

Senator Frith: One more, and he would have a trinity.

Senator Corbin: Senator Le Moyne has already dealt with the trinity. Such a legal personality, or entity, is known as a "corporation sole"—spelled s-o-l-e, and not s-o-u-l—even though the sanctification of souls is what Opus Dei is supposed to be all about. In Canada most, if not all, requests for personal incorporation by way of a private bill have been granted by Parliament, although I am not absolutely certain. My research has not been completed on that score.

As Senator Bélisle pointed out when he introduced the bill at second reading, the general law of Canada regarding non-profit personal corporations has not yet been updated, which explains the vehicle chosen by Opus Dei—that is, to incorporate its regional vicar for Canada by way of a private bill introduced in the Senate and later sent to the House of Commons. We, that is, Parliament, on the other hand, are exercising a real discretion in establishing such corporate creatures. We could refuse, but why do we do it at all? This very question brings me to Senator van Roggen's comments, as reported in the Debates of the Senate of June 2, 1987, at page 1149, when speaking to the second reading of private Bill S-10, "to revive Yellowknife Electric Ltd. and to provide for its continuance under the Canada Corporations Act", he said:

However, I am less inclined to jump to the conclusion that it—

That is, Bill S-10.

—should automatically be favourably considered by the chamber, because, as a matter of general principle, I find it unfortunate that Parliament should be burdened with private matters of this sort whenever it can possibly be avoided.

Senator van Roggen also said:

I simply suggest to honourable senators that the committee, indeed, should look at this carefully to ensure that there is no other legal mechanism that could be used to avoid Parliament's being burdened with this type of private matter.

I believe Senator van Roggen is correct inasmuch as his comments apply to the particular circumstances of the corporation mentioned in Bill S-10, to revive Yellowknife Electric Limited. His comments could also apply to private Bill S-11, introduced just a day or two ago by Senator Frith, respecting a tunnel between Windsor and Detroit. It would not apply to the clarification of the text, which is the object of that bill, but to the original bill introduced in the 1920s. I do feel, however, that Senator van Roggen's comments have a bearing on the Opus Dei bill presently being debated inasmuch as Parliament itself initially creates each and every non-profit corporation at the federal level. The question is: Must this practice be maintained? I shall come back to this point later.

Are honourable senators the only legislators who have misgivings about organizations such as Opus Dei? I remember well the speech made in the House of Commons by Mr. Cooper, the member, then and today, for Peace-River. The occasion was consideration of Bill C-10, the great grandchild of Bills S-3, S-4 and S-7, which were respectively studied and passed by the Senate of Canada between 1977 and 1979, but thrice sacrificed on the Commons' order paper. So, another attempt was made. Debate at second reading of Bill C-10, the fourth attempt at reform, intitled "the Canadian Non-Profit Corporations Act", introduced by the Honourable André Ouellet, began in the Commons on December 17, 1981. At the very beginning of his speech, Mr. Cooper, speaking after the minister, said:

I take pleasure in having the opportunity to speak on this bill tonight. Somehow when one talks of charitable organizations, many images come to mind. We think of clubs, such as the Lions and Kinsmen. We think of church organizations. But at the same time we think of other groups and the abuses that have occurred under the umbrella entitled charitable organizations. I think of groups such as the Moonies. I can think of kidnapping, brainwashing and programming and all those sorts of things that we have heard on the news lately. There is no doubt that is all part of this particular piece of legislation we are addressing tonight.

Now, if Bill C-10, or any one of its predecessors—Bills S-3, S-4 or S-7—had become law, or, indeed, if they were law today, Opus Dei would most likely, this very day, be able to incorporate its regional vicar for Canada by filling out a form at Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and there could possibly have been no way we could have brought into the light of day the deranged spirituality of this clerical mafia and, to say the least, its controversial activities worldwide.

We have been blessed to have been petitioned by way of a private bill by the very people who—there is no doubt in my mind—want to use the law to cloak themselves in secrecy, who would say, "Look, we have the Pope's blessing, and we also want to be good Canadian citizens, just like the bishops, like the dioceses." I am not necessarily impressed by the fact that Opus Dei is a personal prelature of the Pope, for whom I have the greatest respect. I certainly do not consider that to be a binding doctrinal or dogmatic matter. There is a degree of democracy in the church, and there ought to be more, if I may say so. Therefore, I am not disposed to rubber-stamp this bill. That in no way makes me less Christian or less Roman Catholic. I believe my faith, by the grace of God, rests on more solid ground than the wishy-washy Balaguer quotes given by Senator Le Moyne, not to mention the rest of Balaguer's works.

I request a detailed look at Bill S-7 and the mission of Opus Dei in Canada, because I do not know what they are up to. I also want parents and young people to be fully informed that there are options, that the road to personal sanctity is not necessarily circuitous and distorted, if we are to allow this outfit to operate under the generous provisions and protection of Canadian laws.

I had to live through some pretty tough years as an adolescent and as a young man. I do not wish similar experiences on members of my family, or anyone else for that matter. If Opus Dei cannot operate openly at high noon in the full sun of our democracy, it does not deserve to exist.

[Translation]

I have been informed that the Quebec legislature passed some time ago an Act on Catholic Bishops which is a kind of umbrella legislation allowing, roughly, incorporation by the issue of letters patent. This is done at the administrative level by officials, which means that the Quebec National Assembly is not bothered with this type of private request. I believe that this is the kind of legal instrument which Senator van Roggen had in mind. I am told that there are other such pieces of legislation.

There is therefore a major gap in our laws on corporations. Like Senator van Roggen, I believe that the Canadian Parliament should take this opportunity to ask for reintroduction of the bill on non-commercial corporations or, if you prefer, non-profit corporations. We are both hoping that the committee to which Bill S-7 is referred will be able to call experts to discuss this weakness and report on this problem at the same time as on the bill itself. This would satisfy both myself and Senator van Roggen. The Senate will then have played a useful role by sending a clear message to the government.

I even believe that we should perhaps decide that we shall no longer receive any private incorporation requests in the form of private bills until the government has completed its reform of our laws on corporations. After all, honourable senators, this review has been going on for ten years.

If the review of the original Corporations Act were to cover all possible types of incorporation, would this mean that Parliament would in the future no longer allow itself to respond to private unipersonal incorporation requests by passing private bills? We shall have to reflect on this matter in the light of the democratic orientation of our parliamentary institutions. The ancient right of citizens to petition Parliament for a personal incorporation could well disappear in the face of the principle of equality contained in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. However, Parliament could retain this power or else transfer it to the executive by adopting a law of general application. I am not an expert on this matter. I am simply putting the question.

The incorporation requested by private bill of the Regional Vicar of the Opus Dei is certainly exceptional, but to my knowledge, it is not urgent. I cannot see how the Regional Vicar of the Opus Dei would be adversely affected if the Senate were to refuse passage to his bill. After all, how long have these people been operating in Canada? Since 1957? Moreover, does one need civil incorporation for one's personal sanctification? Senator Bélisle has been silent in this regard. Perhaps he can give us some clarification when he closes the debate.

I regretfully share the opinion of those who say this bill must follow the normal channels of referral to a committee. I would prefer to object immediately to this request. However, in the committee, we shall at least have the opportunity to call witnesses, ask them questions and hear the views of corporate law experts. Indeed, we have no obligation to accept the text of the bill as written. We can require the Opus Dei to give an account of itself to Parliament.

If we decide to refer the bill to a committee, it will be our duty to reassure ourselves and the public that such a bill is prejudicial to no one. Furthermore, the Senate has the authority and the duty, if it so decides, to amend the bill, to harmonize it with the intent of our general legislation and with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and to bring its content and provisions into line with the democratic trends of the waning years of this century, a century that has been singularly lacking in enlightenment, considering the genesis and growth of Opus Dei at a time that was a particularly bleak period for humanity.

Honourable senators may wonder about the legal status of the Prelature of Opus Dei in other countries and states. In other words, what kind of approach is taken by other legislatures.

I received the following information from an authorized source on Opus Dei in Canada.

I had asked especially about the legal status of Opus Dei in common-law jurisdictions. The information is neither complete nor entirely satisfactory, and further research will be required. Occasionally, answers remain vague on several points. For instance, it is not known whether certain countries have refused to recognize Opus Dei as a legal entity.

● (1600)

[English]

We are told that in most of these countries—and I am told that Opus Dei operates in approximately 35 countries at last count—Opus Dei acquired civil personality in the years before it was erected as a personal prelature in 1982 under canon law.

Such an answer raises more questions. Does it mean that in some countries Opus Dei did not, or could not, incorporate? When our informer tells us Opus Dei acquired civil personality, is he talking of the organization itself or one individual, like the regional vicar or someone else, and through what legal vehicle? Is there a minimal reporting procedure on the membership and its activities required under those laws?

The informer does say in the next line of this letter, and I quote:

Because of the juridical nature of the prelature at that time—

That is, before 1982:

—in most cases the juridical personality was acquired through the incorporation of a simple non-profit corporation. That is the case in the United States, for example, where the Prelature is incorporated via several non-profit corporations in different states (Illinois, Wisconsin and Maryland for example).

I presume there are others.

It is also the case in Kenya, Ireland and the Philippines.

Our informer, spokesman for Opus Dei, tells us that in some of the above named countries:

... after the erection of Opus Dei as a personal prelature in 1982, some minor changes were made in the governing documents of these non-profit corporations to accommodate the terminology, by-laws etc to the new juridical status of a personal prelature, but so far no definitive solution has been arrived at in any of these countries.

What I really have difficulty with in the information is the vagueness of it. Expressions like "in some", "minor changes", "in most" and "it seems", that is the woof of the fabric of the information sent to me. There is not much to bite into.

I am not saying there is an attempt to camouflage or mislead in this instance, because the information requested was of a rush-order nature. Nevertheless, it seems difficult to put your finger on hard facts with these people. They seem to take the attitude that not only could we not but we should not be bothered with precise and complete information. Legislators cannot satisfy themselves with generalities, and I do hope that we will take as much time as is needed to get a full and complete picture, even if it takes months. Why rush?

I do not wish to be unfair. The letter containing this information is helpful, but to a point only. All I am saying is: Please be more forthcoming.

Another interesting bit of information is the following:

They are all in the process—

That is, those units incorporated since the creation of the prelature in 1982.

—of studying the possibilities allowed them by the civil laws of the country in question but it seems that the corporation sole is not possible in every country. We have been told that in Ireland, for example, the possibility of a corporation sole is not foreseen, even by private bill.

Well, now, isn't that interesting. We in Canada should find out more about the above-board approach to incorporation in Ireland. I quote again:

Now in England, Opus Dei is incorporated as a trust deed of the Sacerdotal Society of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei (the former name before the erection as a Prelature). This trust deed dates from 1954 and is actually in the process of accommodation. It should be noted that in England, the dioceses also use the concept of trust deed to acquire juridical personality. In Australia, Opus Dei is also incorporated via a trust deed dating from 1966. We have learned that in Australia as well, a definitive and satisfactory solution is also being sought.

● (1610)

So it is very obvious, honourable senators, that if we were to rush into incorporating Opus Dei in Canada, in the context of what is being done or attempted worldwide, Canada would create a legislative precedent for the rest of the world to follow, certainly as far as common law countries are concerned.

What about other legal jurisdictions such as Spain, Portugal, South America, Central America, Continental Europe, the East, the Far East?

[Translation]

If in the past, when faced with similar requests for incorporation, Parliament has rarely made any objections, I think this time it should proceed with a great deal of caution because we are not dealing with an ordinary incorporation.

Some radical stands have been taken against Opus Dei. Impassioned speeches are uttered against Opus Dei. Concern has started to grow among the Canadian public in recent years, witness the television program filmed in 1984 by the CBC's Fifth Estate, which we had a chance to watch several times. We are still receiving personal accounts from distraught and even troubled parents.

There is abundant literature on Opus Dei and it shows that there are many reasons why we should be suspicious. The titles are revealing, the sources impressive and the authors credible. Roman Catholic bishops are quoted who had to intervene in their diocese to restrain the activities of Opus Dei. We have the the testimony of priests, ex-members of Opus Dei, who warn us very seriously against this organization.

Honourable senators, this is just to say that, as I said before, unlike other requests for personal incorporation which were not challenged in Parliament, this time we have good reason to be concerned. There is opposition, there are objections, there is controversy, and we are concerned. Reason enough to take a long and serious look at the issue.

Forewarned, legislators have a duty, in this case, to take a careful look at what is behind this bill.

[English]

This is not your run-of-the-mill religious incorporation. "Let the buyer beware," they say in real estate. I say, "let the legislator be doubly on guard with this private bill." The Regional Vicar of the Opus Dei in Canada is but a front. What it hides is what we must be concerned with.

[Translation]

My wife and I are the parents of three girls whom we dearly love, needless to say. We simply do not want them to have anything whatsoever to do with Opus Dei members. The future we want for them would not be an existence dedicated to fundamentalism, to conservatism devoid of any prospect. That is the Opus Dei aspect which scares me. Christ never said that a woman is any less a person than a man. There is not one type of salvation for the "weaker sex," as it was called in the old days, and another one for men. Never will I believe that. Opus Dei says so, its members believe it.

In the Montreal newspaper Le Devoir of May 5, 1987 there was an article by Marie Laurin entitled "Opus Dei in Canada, a work of God and of discretion" and including this testimony:

[Senator Corbin.]

He first got to know OD in Sherbrooke in 1974 through a Spanish priest, Father Josef Escribano, and for him it was "love at first sight": "I had studied at Collège Bréboeuf without ever being unduly concerned about the problems of faith. To me Opus Dei was a real revelation, I would even say an internal revolution where I discovered my way.

The El Camino of Balaguer.

My belonging to this movement is a matter of faith and culture." His wife is also a member of OD and he looks after the nest when she attends her weekly meeting, "sharing the chores being even more imperative in such a big family", he says with a laugh.

But my wife and I live our faith independently. One must have taken part in a study circle to acknowledge and understand this segregation of the sexes in OD. It is important that men and women be separated, for we do not necessarily have the same interests or the same criteria in our spiritual journey. Mutual trust comes more easily when exchanges take place between two persons of the same sex, and I can assure you there is nothing discriminatory in that.

Honourable senators, that makes me sick! Yes, I am opposed in principle to the very existence of such type of secretive society as Opus Dei, to its dubious methods, to its elitism, to its recruiting approach, to its quasi militarist mentality, to its antifeminism, to its insipid spirituality. I believe that as parliamentarians we must take this opportunity to denounce this pious brotherhood and set forth conditions with respect to its corporate and legal recognition in Canada.

I will give you the second part of my speech at a later date. Therefore, honourable senators, I propose to adjourn the debate in my name.

● (1620)

[English]

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, if I may ask a question, and reducing my question to the mundane matter of our procedures in this chamber, and recognizing that by approving this bill on second reading we are approving a matter in principle, if I believe one tenth of the evidence that I have now received from my colleagues and from elsewhere, I just could not, in good conscience, approve this in principle on second reading, yet, I take it from Senator Corbin's remarks that that is what he is suggesting.

Senator Corbin: You understood me rather well, senator. In fact, I have adopted, shall we call it, an ambivalent attitude with respect to the progress of this bill. On the one hand, I recognize the freedom of anyone to petition Parliament and to propose a legislative text. I think we ought to give everyone a fair hearing.

On the principle of the request, I am opposed; on the other hand, I should like to respect this democratic aspect of the normal process of the parliamentary study of bills. What I am suggesting is that perhaps we could all oppose it on division at second reading, without necessarily having a recorded majority vote, let it go on its merry way through committee, where we will have ample opportunity to go into it in depth, and when the committee brings its report to the Senate, we could, if there is such a disposition, have a formal recorded vote and either pass it or block it at that stage.

Does that satisfy the honourable senator's concerns?

Senator Lang: I am afraid not. My conscience is too strong!

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, on the point that has just now been raised, the assertion that a vote on a second-reading motion constitutes approval in principle, I would like to enter an objection.

I know that we often hear it said, and probably some of us ourselves have said that the vote on the motion for second reading is to give approval to the principle of a bill, but if we think the matter through, I think we will conclude that the validity of that proposition is questionable.

What we have before us when there is a motion for second reading is a procedural motion. What a legislative body does when it gives second reading to a bill is say, "We take this bill seriously enough that we are prepared to move it forward into a committee, a committee which will explore the provisions, the defects and the merits of the clauses. We are prepared to commit the time and energy of our members to this bill." We sometimes say that that constitutes approval in principle. However, really, what it does is to move the bill forward to the committee stage, and to define for the committee the matter on which the committee is to adopt clauses and eventually to report. In that sense it specifies what is to be studied: The committee must confine itself to the principle of the bill that has passed second reading. We go too far if we say that we always are giving approval in principle.

Obviously, there are some cases where the matter is so clear that one can vote yes or no; there you are dealing with the principle. But there are other situations in which one is saying, "Yes, we are prepared to have an intensive look at this, hoping that the work of the committee will clarify the situation and help us make up our minds."

Honourable senators, I have thought a lot about this over the years, because it is sometimes said that if one votes for a bill on the motion for second reading, one is inevitably committed to vote for it on the motion for third reading. I do not think that follows at all. I think one can vote to advance the bill at second reading, refer it to committee, and then, after considering the report of the committee, one can, quite logically, vote against the motion for third reading.

Honourable senators, I do not want to say anything more on this. I simply want to record a footnote of objection against the notion that to vote for second reading always constitutes an expression of approval in principle.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I do not want to delay this matter, but I was most intrigued by Senator Stewart's suggestion that we are not approving something in principle on second reading. I have not heard that argument before, and I certainly bow to his superior knowledge in procedural matters.

Senator Corbin said that he would be speaking to this matter again since he had delivered only half of his address. In his second portion, perhaps he could include some legal opinion or support for Senator Stewart's position in answer to the question of Senator Lang.

Quite frankly, because of the question of approval in principle, I had been close to being prepared to vote against this bill on the motion for second reading.

Senator Corbin: Thank you, honourable senator. I will certainly take those comments into account.

Senator van Roggen mentioned that I had delivered half of my speech today. I would just mention that the next portion may not be so long.

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MAKE FEASIBILITY STUDY OF "SNOWBIRDS" VISIT TO NATO ALLIES

Hon. Peter Bosa, pursuant to his notice of motion of May 26, 1987, moved:

That the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence be authorized to examine the feasibility, logistics and merits of a visit by Canada's air demonstration team the "Snowbirds" to our NATO allies in Europe in the near future.

He said: Honourable senators, I would like to say a few words today to pay tribute to and congratulate the "Snowbirds", the aerobatic team of the Royal Canadian Air Force.

The "Snowbirds", or Squadron 431, as it is called in the Royal Canadian Air Force, deserve a special place in the hearts of all Canadians. Every year, the team gives between 65 and 70 aerobatic demonstrations before more than five million spectators. This year, the "Snowbirds" will give 44 aerobatic demonstrations in various places, from Florida to the Canadian Northwest Territories.

[English]

The Snowbirds were organized in 1971 by Colonel O.B. Philip, Base Commander, CFB Moose Jaw. Up to that time the Canadian Forces aerobatic teams had had a rather precarious history.

Beginning with the Siskins, who flew from 1929 to 1931, there have been six different Canadian Forces aerobatic teams. Among the most memorable were the Golden Hawks, which were formed in 1959 to commemorate the 50th anniversary of flight in Canada, and which, in the five short years they flew, gained a reputation as one of the finest aerobatic teams in the world. Another famous team was the Golden Centennaires, organized as part of the Armed Forces salute to Canada's Centennial year, 1967.

• (1630)

It is sad to note that Canada's early aerobatic teams, including the Snowbirds themselves in their formative years, were faced with the same problem: Would they be together as a unit the following year? Teams were formed and held together by little more than the initiative and perseverance of the dedicated individual pilots, ground crew and others who believed in them, and never knew a secure future, in spite of the acclaim of those who saw their performance. The Canadian public thought of their aerobatic units as representing the best of Canada's Air Force pilots; they inspired more than applause, they inspired respect and admiration. It would take the first seven years of the Snowbirds' life, however, before they were accorded permanent standing.

The original aerobatic team, consisting for the most part of instructors from No. 2 Canadian Forces pilot training school at Moose Jaw, first performed under the name "Snowbirds" on July 11, 1971, at the Saskatchewan Homecoming Air Show. The name "Snowbirds" was selected as the result of a contest held at CFB Moose Jaw's elementary school.

Between 1971 and the end of March 1978, the Snowbirds operated on a year-to-year basis. On Air Force Day, April 1, 1978, the team finally received official squadron status as the 431 Air Demonstration Squadron.

The aircraft used continue to be CT 114 Tutor Jets manufactured by Canadair of Montreal. The team consists of nine aircraft, supported by a 21-man crew of pilots and technical personnel. Each year half of the members of the team leave, so that the entire team has changed after two years. The present Base Commander at CFB Moose Jaw is Colonel G.E. Miller, and the team leader is Major Dennis Beselt. The other pilot team members are Captain Joe Parente, Captain Paul Giles, Captain Jim Fowlow, Captain Don Barnby, Captain Boyd Smith, Captain Howard Tarbet, Captain Wes MacKay and Captain Don Brodeur. The team coordinators are Captain Richard Lapointe and Captain Eric Dumont. Like the RCMP's musical ride, the Snowbirds are becoming a regular feature of many exhibitions, special events and fairs throughout Canada and the United States. While the RCMP's musical ride has garnered the praise of world-wide audiences and has, as a goodwill ambassador, contributed to enhancing Canada's reputation, the Snowbirds have yet to perform outside North America, most notably in Europe.

Our European and U.S. allies have not missed opportunities to have their aerobatic teams perform here. In the past

Canada has played host to military aerobatic teams of the U.S.A., Brazil, Britain, France and Italy. I am of the opinion that it is long past the time when Canada should reciprocate. As a demonstration of our commitment to and pride in our own national aerobatic team, the Snowbirds should be given the opportunity to show European audiences what Canadian and American audiences have known since July 11, 1971; namely, that the Royal Canadian Air Force has one of the best nine-member aerobatic teams in the world.

A series of European shows would, I believe, serve Canada well. Such performances would raise the profile of our military personnel throughout Europe, and could focus attention on our new state-of-the-art equipment, most notably the CF-18 fighter aircraft, which is already stationed there. Through such shows Europeans could become more familiar with Canada generally.

While delivering the team to Europe would require a modest expenditure of funds, the long-term goodwill generated by the show would be of enormous benefit to Canada.

Canadians have long recognized the dedication and effort of our military personnel who worked to create the Snowbirds. Canadians also recognize that the current team is proudly carrying on the tradition of excellence first established by aerobatic teams some 50 years ago.

The CBC paid homage to the Snowbirds on Sunday, April 29, 1987, in a one-hour television documentary. The program gave Canadians the rare opportunity to meet members of the team and their families, and also contained some thrilling sequences of the Snowbirds in action.

I hope that the Special Committee on National Defence will see the merits of recommending that the Snowbirds have an opportunity to perform in Europe.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

OFFICIAL REPORT

QUALITY OF TRANSLATION

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I would first like to humbly request that Senator Le Moyne pardon me, because I did not follow the salutary advice he sent around to all honourable senators last week with respect to ascertaining that the translation of one's speeches is approved by oneself before publication. I hope he will forgive me for not being a faithful follower of his very good advice.

The translation of the French text of the speech I delivered in the Senate yesterday is a complete bamboozle.

Senator Guay: That is not the first time.

Senator Corbin: It is a fraud; it is a fake, and I plead with my honourable colleagues not to read the English text of the speech I gave in this house yesterday, because I cannot stand behind it the way it has been translated. It is an absolute mess; it is an absolute shame, and I think the time has come for the Senate to set up its own translation services. The disservice this does to us is something out of this world—it is prejudicial, it causes me great harm, and I am not the only senator being hurt by the lack of proper translation facilities.

I thank honourable senators for their attention.

Senator Guay: I will second the motion.

Hon. Ann Elizabeth Bell: Honourable senators, on Senator Corbin's point of order, I might point out that this is rather like banning a book in Boston—we are all going to leap to the Debates of the Senate to read his speech again.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION BILL, 1987

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-18, respecting national transportation.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

THE CONSTITUTION

NOTICE OF MOTION TO AMEND THE CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Tuesday next, June 23, 1987, I will move:

That the Senate resolve that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation, issued by Her Excellency the Governor General, under the Great Seal of Canada, as follows:

PROCLAMATION AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

Section 31(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867 is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

“(1) If, for two consecutive calendar years, he fails to give his attendance in the Senate for at least one-third of the sittings in each of those years”, and

That a message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House thereof and to invite them to join with this House in the aforementioned action.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AND DUTIES RELIEF ACT

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-69

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce be authorized to examine the subject matter of the Bill C-69, An Act to amend the Customs Tariff and the Duties Relief Act, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, June 22, 1987, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

I will say a word about this if the Senate so desires.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, we will grant leave, but we would like an explanation.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, the purpose of coming back on Monday is to try to keep ahead of the schedule, particularly as it relates to Senate committees. We have several pieces of legislation on the order paper. We received Bill C-18 today, and we hope to start second reading of it on Monday. We will also receive Bill C-19 on Monday, I understand, and we can proceed to second reading on that bill at that time as well, or on Tuesday if the Senate prefers. We will also deal with the other legislation on the order paper. As well, we have indications that other legislation might very well reach us early in the week.

With regard to Senate committees, the workload now before the committees, involving both pre-study and the actual study of legislation as well as the preparation of reports preparatory to the close of the session, is a rather heavy one. The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has a pre-study of Bill C-2 under way, which is a bill that we would like to have dealt with before we finish this session's business.

Senator Frith: Is it Canagrex?

Senator Doody: That is the Canagrex Dissolution Act. They also have a study of farm finance under way. Banking, Trade and Commerce has three pre-studies under way and a fourth one which was referred to them today; Energy and Natural Resources has two studies under way; Fisheries has two studies under way; Foreign Affairs has two matters before them; Legal and Constitutional Affairs has Bill C-15 before them plus two other bills which were referred to them yesterday; National Defence has a study; National Finance has the estimates and the tax expenditures before them; Official Languages has two items; and Social Affairs, Science and Technology has five matters before them at the present time. Of course, we also have the special committee dealing with Bill C-22. The Special Committee on Terrorism and Public Safety is meeting to draft its report; and the Committee on Transport and Communications has before it the pre-study of Bill C-21. The committee has also had referred to it for pre-study Bills C-18 and C-19, dealing with national transportation and motor vehicle transport.

● (1410)

So, if we happen to adjourn early on either Monday or Tuesday, it is hoped that we will be able to fit in some committee meetings; and, of course, Monday and Tuesday mornings and evenings are also available for committee meetings.

Therefore, we have a pretty heavy schedule ahead of us. Wednesday is, of course, Saint Jean Baptiste Day and will be a general holiday. I expect that the Senate, as always, will observe that day. What happens later in the week will, to a large extent, be dictated by the amount of legislation coming to us from the other place. We anticipate quite a bit, but it may be too early at this point to be more specific.

Motion agreed to.

TAX REFORM

WHITE PAPER—TWENTY CONSULTANTS—FEMALE REPRESENTATION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, I believe that all Canadians were amazed to discover this week that there is a new form of the Order of Canada in the land. Twenty favoured Canadians have been called upon to see the tax reform announcement for tonight before parliamentarians.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Marsden: I am sure that many honourable senators have questions about this. My question to the Leader of the Government is: What proportion of those 20 people were women?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am afraid I have not the slightest idea. The matter raised by the honourable senator has been fully dealt with by the Minister of Finance during oral Question Period in the other house.

Senator Perrault: What has that to do with it?

REPORTING OF COSTS OF CONSULTANTS FOR TAX PURPOSES

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government dealing with those 20 special people. I understand that for some months their firms carried the costs for those people, including their travelling expenses. My question is: When their firms report that, will they report it as a political donation or as a cost of doing business?

Senator Perrault: A good question.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I assume that the question is rhetorical and that the honourable senator does not expect me, or any member of the government, to delve into the tax returns of those individuals or corporations. It is not our style.

Senator Sinclair: I take it that the answer of the Leader of the Government means that he does accept the fact that the costs will appear in tax returns. Is that what his answer means?

Senator Murray: The honourable senator has asked me to speculate on what those taxpayers might register in their tax returns. I have no idea and no way of finding out. I hope he is not encouraging me to try.

Senator Olson: What is the government's response?

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES ACT

STATUS OF BILL TO AMEND

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, my question is directed to the Leader of the Government, and I would like to ask him whether today he has any more news about when the government intends to table its bill to amend the Official Languages Act. Is there any news? For instance, will the bill be tabled before we adjourn, as assumed, for the summer?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, the government's commitment is as I described the other day. We are committed to tabling our reform of official languages legislation and policy during the current session.

I hope and I continue to hope that it will be possible to table this bill before the summer recess.

CONSULTATIONS BY SECRETARY OF STATE—INJUSTICE TO PARLIAMENTARIANS

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I am concerned about the fact that the Secretary of State, who is normally responsible in Cabinet for sponsoring and introducing such a bill, has stated that he had consulted and probably still is consulting with individuals and groups across the country on the subject of the amendments the government wishes to table in Parliament.

I consider this to be an injustice to parliamentarians, since they are not consulted as well. What is wrong with tabling a bill and then consulting with both the public and parliamentarians?

We are now in a position where the Commissioner of Official Languages and the francophones—hors-Québec groups and other people have had a chance to hear about the government's plans, while we parliamentarians are right at the end of the line.

Are we less qualified than the average citizen to study the contents of the bill? I don't see why we in Parliament should be treated as second-class citizens.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, parliamentarians are hardly at the end of the line. My honourable friend was joint chairman of the Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs. The Committee made recommendations to the government. The government has considered all these recommendations.

We have consulted with all intervenors, all associations and all representatives of language minorities across this country.

I may add that there are three aspects to this linguistic reform. First of all, there will be the bill to amend the Official Languages Act, which will be sponsored, not by the Secretary of State, but by the Minister of Justice. Certain policies will be announced by the Secretary of State and will concern the role of the federal government vis-à-vis the language minorities in this country. Finally, there will be the regulatory aspect and how the policy affects the public service, all of which comes under the jurisdiction of the President of the Treasury Board.

As far as the general aspects of this reform are concerned, we are consulting with representatives of language minorities across the country. We have considered the recommendations made by the Commissioner of Official Languages and the Joint Committee on Official Languages Policy and Programs. As I said earlier, I still hope it will be possible to table the reform before the summer recess.

REPORT OF OFFICIAL LANGUAGES COMMITTEE—GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, yesterday afternoon, the Joint Committee on Official Languages—a pity Senator Woods is not here today since she is Joint Chairman of this Committee—was working on the report we want to submit to the minister on amendments to the Official Languages Act. We have not finished yet, and our report has yet to be submitted. We will be suggesting some very substantial changes, and I hope we will have a chance to do so before the middle of next week. We met yesterday afternoon but we have not had a chance to finish this report.

Since you have been so considerate about consulting with our fellow Canadians on amendments to the Official Languages Act and perhaps other legislation as well, I hope you will show some consideration to this very important committee which I am sure will want to make some suggestions.

ENERGY

DOMESTIC PETROLEUM-AMOCO CANADA TRANSACTION—AVAILABILITY OF DOCUMENTS TO GOVERNMENT

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, I have a question concerning the Dome-Amoco transaction. I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate: Has Investment Canada or the minister received a copy of the bidding rules set by Dome, a copy of each of the three bids, and a copy of the contract entered into between Dome and Amoco? Has the government, either through Investment Canada or through any of its branches or agencies, obtained these documents?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not know the answer to the question. I cannot speak for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. I shall inquire.

As for Investment Canada, I would have thought, before any transaction was officially proposed, that it was unusual for Investment Canada to ask for or, indeed, to receive a copy of the bidding rules or of the three bids, or, indeed, of the contract between Dome and Amoco, until such time as the shareholders had decided what they wanted to do.

Senator Stewart: Then, may I ask the minister: If an application is received by Investment Canada, will Investment Canada and/or the appropriate minister undertake to acquire and examine all of these documents?

Senator Murray: I will take that question as notice, honourable senators. I can only say that the usual procedure would be followed.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

STATUS OF AMENDMENTS TO CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, it is approximately a year ago since we debated and passed Bill C-62, respecting employment equity, as it was called. At that time it was quite apparent to everyone, including Mr. Fairweather from the Canadian Human Rights Commission, that there needed to be amendments to sections of the Canadian Human Rights Act in order to make effective the implementation of the Employment Equity Bill.

We were promised those amendments months ago. It is my understanding that the amendments are prepared, but not yet through cabinet. I wonder if the minister could tell us when we can expect to see those crucial amendments, which are needed in order to make sense of the bill passed last June.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Again, honourable senators, I am sorry I am not in a position to respond. I shall make inquiries and advise the honourable senator accordingly.

AGRICULTURE

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS TO WESTERN GRAIN FARMERS FOR 1987 CROP YEAR

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, a few days ago the Leader of the Government in the Senate undertook to make some inquiries of his colleagues, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister responsible for the Wheat Board, as to the status of the deficiency acreage payment for the 1987 crop year. At that time he said that he would report when there was something to report, and that an announcement would be made in the usual way.

I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate has found out anything that he should report. I would entreat him, because it is the last day of the second-last week and there are some farmers who are extremely concerned about 1987, in view of the severe reduction in the prices that they can expect for this year's crop.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I would definitely not expect any announcement of a new program in that regard before the summer adjournment. But then, again, as I said the other day, I do not know when the summer adjournment will begin.

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Olson: Perhaps the honourable minister could give some comfort to the farmers who are caught in this, if not desperate, certainly very uncomfortable situation by disclosing whether or not the government is seriously considering a program for 1987 similar to that of 1986. I know the minister told me that there were some conversations going on between the two levels of government and with farm organizations, but so far we have not had one word from him to give hope to the farmers that the government is seriously considering a program for this year. Until the farmers get some comforting words from the government, of course, they may not have any income.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, our record to date in fighting for the interests of the farmers, both nationally and on the international scene, and in bringing assistance to farmers is absolutely the best guarantee that the farming community in this country could have as to the future actions of the government.

Senator Frith: What worries us is that you think so.

Senator Olson: Can the Leader of the Government in the Senate say whether this government is likely to bring in a program for this year at least as good as last year's?

Senator Murray: I am glad you liked last year's program

TAX REFORM

WHITE PAPER—TWENTY CONSULTANTS—FEMALE REPRESENTATION—GOVERNMENT LEADER'S ANSWER TO QUESTION—RIGHT OF SENATORS TO ASK QUESTIONS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, earlier today Senator Marsden asked a question of the Leader of the Government in the Senate in which she was clearly asking for information respecting how many of the people invited to participate in this tax expert panel were women, and the Leader of the Government in the Senate said that he had not the slightest idea, and that the matter had been dealt with in the other place.

● (1420)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): The general question—

Senator Frith: What is the relevance of what is taking place in the other place? Are we to read Commons Debates to obtain that information?

Senator Murray: I wish you would!

Senator Perrault: Your responsibility is to this chamber.

Senator Frith: Do I understand, then, that if we want information on anything that is dealt with in the other place we have to go to the other place to obtain that information, and that the Leader of the Government in the Senate is not going to obtain that information for the Senate?

Senator Murray: Not at all, honourable senators. The preface to the question asked by our colleague, Senator Marsden, was rather rhetorical, but included general questions that had been asked in the other place and which were answered by the responsible minister, Mr. Wilson, in the other place. I simply wanted to indicate that that was the case.

The honourable senator is not precluded from wasting his time and the time of the Senate, if he wishes to do so, by asking the same questions that have been answered by the responsible minister in the other place. I am not precluded from taking every question as notice and bringing in delayed answers, if I wish to do that, but I would hope we would operate on a more reasonable basis, and that the honourable senator would not expect me to be in a position to answer in detail, on the spot, for every other minister in respect of every detail of that minister's department. I will give such information as I can give properly and with confidence of its accuracy.

Meanwhile, I do suggest that honourable senators avail themselves of the opportunity to peruse their free copies of Commons Debates.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, there are a couple of branches to what was just said. First of all, there has never been a suggestion that the Leader of the Government in the Senate should not have an opportunity to take questions as notice so that he can obtain information. Of course he can. In fact, he does not even have to answer questions, for that matter, so let us start from point zero. If the leader wants to take that position, he is free to do so.

Let us get to the particular question that was asked, which was whether any of these people were women. The answer given was that the Leader of the Government had not the slightest idea, and that the matter had been dealt with in the other place. Since he did not have the slightest idea, I can only assume he would not know whether the particular question was answered in the other place. So, there are two things: first of all, we have to go to the other place; and, second, he did not take the question as notice and was not able to tell us whether that question was answered in the other place.

Senator Perrault: That is because the leader does not read Commons Debates.

Senator Frith: Obviously, he does not, or he would have had some idea. So he wants us to do something he is not prepared to do himself. It does not seem to me that that is a very—

Senator Murray: Surely some honourable senators on that side have a plane to catch!

Senator Frith: The Leader of the Government has asked us to behave in a reasonable way; I suggest that he is not behaving reasonably as it relates to answering questions and fulfilling his duties to the Senate.

I can tell by the leader's sighing, and because he is looking at his watch, that he finds this whole procedure rather boring, and therefore does not want to be taken to task with regard to his obligation to answer questions in the Senate. He can refuse to answer questions, but if the leader is going to undertake to provide information, I suggest that he give that undertaking in the Senate, and not refer senators to the proceedings of the other place.

Senator Murray: I might say that the original question raised by Senator Marsden was one that sought detail as to the sexual identity of those involved.

Senator Frith: I do not think she had in mind a detailed inspection at all. Whether they were men or women is evident without a detailed inspection.

Senator Murray: I would suggest that the question be put on the order paper, and we shall bring a reply in due course.

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, the question was not asked in the other place. As far as I can see from reading the debates of the other place, the question was not raised. It would be helpful to know this. This is not an idle question, I should like to assure the Leader of the Government in the Senate, because, of course, the concerns of women with respect to tax reform, because of the economic circumstances of women, may be rather different from the concerns of men. Therefore, the question is highly relevant.

THE SENATE

DATE OF SUMMER ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have another question which perhaps the leader can answer, or he may wish his deputy to answer.

A moment ago the Leader of the Government in the Senate, in answer to a question by Senator Olson, said that he did not know when the summer adjournment would take place. Since the adjournment of the House of Commons is now fixed by rules in that place, I take it he means that he does not know when we will adjourn here. Those rules are permanent. They will be adjourning on June 30. I am again asking for information. I could go and ask for it in the other place, but I think this is a question that would best be answered here. The question is: Does he mean that he does not know when we will be adjourning?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Obviously, no, I do not know when we will be adjourning.

Senator Flynn: Perhaps you should read what goes on in the other place.

Senator Frith: He does not read that. We should read about that, because he does not read what goes on in the other place.

Senator Flynn: Read the rules of the other place.

TAX REFORM

WHITE PAPER—TWENTY CONSULTANTS—NAMES AND GENDER—REQUEST FOR TABLING

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate on the question raised by Senator Marsden.

As Senator Marsden phrased her question, it could well be answered, in due course, by a simple naming of one person or by saying that there were two women in the group of 20. I wonder if I might go further and ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate if he will table in the Senate the names of the 20 people and their sex, if not their sexual proclivities.

Hon. Senators: Oh, Oh!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): I will see whether that information is available.

THE SENATE

SUGGESTED SITTINGS IN PROVINCIAL CAPITALS

Hon. Peter Bosa: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. In view of the fact that the Meech Lake accord contains a provision whereby the provinces in future will submit a list of nominees for consideration by the Prime Minister for membership in the upper house, has the leader considered, or will he consider, having some meetings of the Senate take place in the capitals of the provinces on occasion in order to bring this institution closer to the people?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, unfortunately, we are labouring under very serious budgetary constraints, and I doubt whether the honourable senator's suggestion would be feasible.

PARLIAMENT

SUMMER PROROGATION—GOVERNMENT INTENTION

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I wish to ask a very simple question, stimulated by the use of the expression, three times by the Leader of the Government, "summer adjournment."

Is he putting to rest the rumours that have been circulating around Parliament Hill that the government will have a summer prorogation?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I have not heard any such rumours and therefore cannot comment.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): You should read the debates of the other place!

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, perhaps I made a mistake by relating my question to a rumour. Does the government propose a summer prorogation?

Senator Murray: The answer is pretty much the same, honourable senators: No such decision has been taken by the government.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION NATIONAL DEFENCE

NUCLEAR-POWERED SUBMARINES—NON-PROLIFERATION TREATY—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question asked by Senator Bosa on June 17 regarding National Defence, specifically nuclear-powered submarines.

The acquisition by Canada of nuclear-powered submarines would be fully consistent with Canada's non-proliferation policy as enunciated in 1974 and confirmed in 1976 and 1981. It would also be consistent with our commitment under the Non-Proliferation Treaty (NPT).

Canadian non-proliferation policy states that Canadian nuclear cooperation shall be for non nuclear-explosive purposes only. The NPT is similarly concerned about the proliferation of "nuclear weapons and other nuclear-explosive devices". This clearly allows for cooperation in non proscribed (i.e. non nuclear explosive) military applications. The safeguards agreement Canada negotiated with the International Atomic Energy Agency pursuant to its ratification of the NPT recognizes that fact and contains provisions for nuclear material to be used in military applications to be exempted from safeguards.

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C., for the second reading of the Bill C-65, An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1988.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, yesterday, when I adjourned the debate on this order, I mentioned that I did so in order to have an opportunity to look at the proceedings of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which had, of course, dealt with these estimates.

Honourable senators will remember that when interim supply was granted, certain debate did take place, or comments were made at that time, about the proceedings of the National Finance Committee. I also made some inquiries and found that the committee is continuing with its hearings dealing with the Treasury Board, and particularly with some questions and recommendations that the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance made to the Thirty-Third Parliament. It seems that the committee and the Treasury Board officials are getting on very well with this effort. The committee will report further on that subject.

● (1430)

Honourable senators, I see no reason why we should not release the balance of the Main Estimates at this time. Of course, there is no need for the bill to go to committee, because the estimates were studied by our committee in April. Since this is Thursday, and the motion for adjournment has us sitting again on Monday, I see no reason why we should wait until the next sitting of the Senate for third reading of this bill. I think it could be read the third time today.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if Senator Doody speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I thank Senator Frith for his comments.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), moved that the bill be read the third time now.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

CANADIAN EXPLORATION AND DEVELOPMENT INCENTIVES PROGRAM BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of Honourable Senator Balfour, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rossiter, for the second reading of the Bill C-59, An Act to provide for payments in respect of exploration for or development of lands for the production of hydrocarbons in Canada other than coal.—(Honourable Senator Balfour).

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, if Senator Balfour speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, yesterday, in his remarks concerning Bill C-59, Senator Olson raised some questions with respect to clauses 6, 8, 9 and 10 of the bill and requested a more detailed explanation with respect to their effect and application.

Senator Olson was correct when he stated that clause 6 was intended to prohibit a number of persons from dividing themselves into more than one entity so that they could circumvent the $10 million annual expense limit set out in the bill. Paragraph (a) of clause 6 states that the term "associated" will be specifically defined in the regulations. Detailed rules will be required to deal with the myriad of intercorporate arrangements which exist in the oil industry. Speaking generally, these rules will correspond to the rules contained in the Income Tax Act relating to associated corporations.

Paragraph (b) of clause 6 gives the minister the authority to deem persons who would not otherwise be associated to be associated in circumstances where the minister is satisfied that there is no bona fide reason for one of the persons to be in existence other than to circumvent the annual expense limit.

Clause 8 sets out special rules for dealing with corporations which finance exploration and development activity through the use of flow-through shares. A flow-through share arrangement may generally be defined as an agreement in writing between a corporation, "a flow-through share corporation", and a person, an "investor", pursuant to which the flow-through share corporation, in return for certain consideration which it receives from the investor, issues shares to the investor. The investor's funds are used by the corporation to incur Canadian exploration expense or Canadian development expense.

Post-1986 flow-through share agreements are referred to as "new" flow-through share agreements. It is the corporation that incurs the expense and then renounces the expense to the investor. Clause 8, subclause (1), permits the company issuing the share to elect to flow through the CEDIP to the investors or to retain the CEDIP itself. This flexibility was expressly requested by industry.

Subclause (2) of clause 8 sets out that where an election is filed, the corporation is deemed not to be entitled to the CEDIP. It will be flowed through to the investors. The investors are entitled to the CEDIP, and the corporation makes application and receives the CEDIP in trust for them. The CEDIP does not become a corporate asset.

For the purposes of determining the annual expense limit, it is the corporation which must combine the eligible expenses incurred under such agreements with the eligible expenses it has incurred on its own behalf.

Clause 9 covers agreements pre-1987, which are referred to as "old" flow-through shares, and under these agreements the investor uses the corporation as its agent to incur expenses. Subparagraph (a) sets out that it is the corporation issuing the shares that shall apply for CEDIP on behalf of the investors. Subparagraph (b) establishes that the investors are entitled to CEDIP, and that the corporation will be paid the CEDIP as trustee for the investors. Subparagraph (c) establishes that the corporation must combine the eligible expenses it incurs on its own behalf with those incurred under these flow-through share agreements, for the purpose of determining the annual expense limit.

With respect to clause 9, it should be explained that the Income Tax Act as it currently exists made certain "grandfather" provisions to apply to flow-through share agreements made prior to 1987.

Clause 10 is technical in nature. Its purpose is to make possible payments of CEDIP benefits to a person other than the person who was entitled in the event of death, assignment, amalgamation, dissolution and similar occurrence. It is necessary in this respect to comply with the provisions of Part IX of the Financial Administration Act, which is procedural in nature.

Honourable senators, I apologize for the technical nature of that explanation. It would normally have been provided in committee, but in the interests of expediency Senator Olson and I agreed that we would deal with it in this way. I hope I have satisfied his inquiry.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, when a bill receives second reading and it is anticipated that it will probably get third reading without referral to committee, our usual practice, if there is no arrangement for Royal Assent on that day, is to have it wait for third reading until the next sitting of the Senate. However, since legislation is piling up, I wonder whether we should not make an exception in this case. We know that we will be giving the bill third reading at the next sitting of the Senate, and I suggest that in order to keep our order paper uncluttered, perhaps we should proceed to give it third reading immediately. We know that the bill will not be going to committee, and that it will receive third reading on Monday anyway.

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, Senator Olson and I had discussions yesterday and that was agreed to.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have one further question, and I am sorry that I did not ask it yesterday. Could the sponsor of the bill tell us when he expects that this bill will be proclaimed and when it will be administered? In other words, are applications being accepted now for the contributions under this bill? If not, on what date can we expect the bill to be applicable?

Senator Balfour: Honourable senators, I understand that the bill will be proclaimed forthwith, that is, by the end of the month, before we rise. It will take effect from April 1, 1987. The administrative machinery has not yet been set up in Calgary, but this is being attacked, as I understand it, with a sense of urgency.

Honourable senators, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Senator Balfour.]

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BELL CANADA BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. William M. Kelly moved the second reading of Bill C-13, respecting the reorganization of Bell Canada.

He said: Honourable senators, I welcome this opportunity to sponsor Bill C-13, the Bell reorganization bill.

As you are aware, Bill C-13 is an important bill. Although its provisions might appear to be merely regulatory housekeeping, their consequences could well affect both telephone users and television viewers.

The purpose of Bill C-13 is to clarify the powers of CRTC to regulate Bell Canada, and to ensure that the reorganization does not adversely affect the interests of Bell's telephone subscribers.

Before the reorganization, Bell Canada was an operating company providing telephone service in Ontario and Quebec. It was also a holding company with investments in several provincially-regulated telephone companies and several unregulated companies such as Northern Telecom.

The monopoly provision of telephone service created the need to regulate rates and services in the public interest. At the present time, however, the telecommunications industry worldwide is undergoing rapid changes in response to technological advances. New services have evolved which are subject to the competitive test of the marketplace. Regulation is less necessary in such a situation.

It is, of course, true that many of the basic services offered by Bell Canada and other telephone companies are still offered on a monopoly basis. It is equally certain that many telecommunications activities are subject to growing competition, sometimes international in scope. Bell Canada's objective in the reorganization undertaken in 1982 was to distinguish clearly its regulated monopoly activities from its non-regulated competitive activities.

Some senators may know that I spent a considerable amount of my own corporate life in a regulated utility, which, over time, moved in a number of new directions into activities considerably more competitive and less regulated. We carried out a similar reorganization, as a matter of good business practice in our opinion, to bring the regulated part of our business into sharper focus for regulation overview. I am sure that Senator Sinclair, with his long experience in Canadian Pacific, and Senator MacDonald, with his extensive broadcasting background, share these perspectives.

In any event, my own experience compels me to support the reorganization which Bell Canada undertook in 1982.

As a result of the reorganization, a new parent company, Bell Canada Enterprises, has been created. Bell Canada, the telephone company, is now a wholly-owned subsidiary of Bell Canada Enterprises.

For years Bell Canada, the telephone company, was regulated under the provisions of the Bell Canada Special Act, the Railway Act and the National Transportation Act. The reorganization, however, threw into doubt the ability of the CRTC to regulate the company effectively.

In April 1983, in response to an order from the Governor in Council, the CRTC submitted a report on the reorganization, stating that it was in favour of the reorganization, but concluded that certain legislative amendments would be required to clarify its powers to regulate Bell Canada and thus protect the interests of telephone subscribers.

Bill C-13 confirms the CRTC's power to regulate the telephone service. It takes into account the specific recommendations of the CRTC and the concerns expressed by a wide range of interest groups.

Witnesses from six organizations expressed their views on Bill C-13 during the present session of the House of Commons. Bell Canada, CNCP Telecommunications, the Association of Competitive Telecommunications Suppliers and the CRTC appeared to reaffirm their views on the bill. There has, therefore, been very careful consideration of this bill. In its present form it takes into account the stated concerns of interested parties.

The first ten clauses of the bill restate the provisions of the Bell Special Act under which Bell Canada was originally established, including clause 7, honourable senators, which maintains the existing statutory prohibition against Bell Canada holding a broadcasting licence. The remaining clauses contain provisions relating to the reorganization and Bell Canada's new role in it. These latter clauses are intended to ensure that the CRTC will continue to have the power to regulate Bell Canada in this new environment.

Clause 11 contains a provision requiring the CRTC to approve the disposal or sale of Bell Canada shares, all of which are now held by Bell Canada Enterprises.

Clause 12 allows the CRTC to obtain information from Bell Canada Enterprises relative to the regulation of Bell Canada's operations. It ensures that the CRTC can gain all the information it needs to regulate the monopoly. As drafted, it permits the CRTC to request information from any Bell Canada Enterprise affiliate as long as the information is relevant to the regulation of Bell.

Clause 13 contains provisions to allow the CRTC to decide whether particular telecommunications services offered by Bell Canada should be carried out on a competitive or a monopoly basis.

Honourable senators, as stated earlier, a major feature of the Bell reorganization was the intended division of activities that are subject to regulation from those other activities which are to be conducted in non-regulated subsidiaries of Bell Canada Enterprises.

Subclauses 13(1) and (2) give the commission powers to order Bell Canada to undertake an activity provided by an affiliate not subject to a sufficient degree of competition. This is what is known as the "in" power. On the other hand, the CRTC can also order Bell Canada to divest itself of an activity that the commission determines is sufficiently competitive not to require regulatory supervision. This is known as the "out" power. These powers enable the commission to prevent the cross-subsidization of competitive activities by monopoly activities.

This, of course, is the concern that is always present in a company in the form that Bell Canada had prior to this reorganization.

The provisions clarify the fact that provincially-regulated affiliates of Bell are not affected by the "in" power. They also ensure that activities which would not otherwise be subject to regulation under the Railway Act, if conducted by Bell, cannot be the subject of an order. Finally, they require the application of a relatively restrictive test before the commission may order the company to undertake an activity or to divest itself of an activity.

In summary, by reaffirming the long-standing provisions of Bell's Special Act, and by conferring three specific new powers on the CRTC, Bill C-13 enables the commission to carry out its mandate to regulate the monopoly telephone service of Bell Canada.

In my opinion, the bill as it stands, therefore, achieves its objectives. The bill ensures that the CRTC clearly has the necessary powers that it requires to exercise its mandate—the regulation of the monopoly services of Bell Canada—in the increasingly competitive telecommunications market.

At the same time, the bill permits Bell Canada Enterprises and its unregulated affiliates to pursue competitive opportunities. I believe that this is important both domestically and internationally.

The bill is therefore designed to maintain the excellent telephone system that has evolved over many years. At the same time, it is designed to allow the Bell group of companies to meet the challenges of competition without regulatory restrictions.

Honourable senators, I conclude by commending Bill C-13 to this chamber. I suggest that it be approved, and that we let Bell get on with its business.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

SECOND REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the second report of the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence (budget re examination of Canada's land forces), presented in the Senate on Wednesday, June 17, 1987.

Hon. Paul Lafond: Honourable senators, this report is concerned exclusively with the budget of the Special Committee on National Defence, which was tabled yesterday and is reproduced as Appendix "A" to yesterday's Debates of the Senate.

The proposed budget has been approved by the Internal Economy Committee and its subcommittee. Therefore, I move the adoption of the report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

INTERNAL ECONOMY, BUDGETS AND ADMINISTRATION

SIXTEENTH TO TWENTY-EIGHTH REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

- 16th Agriculture and Forestry;
- 17th Banking, Trade and Commerce;
- 18th Energy and Natural Resources;
- 19th Fisheries;
- 20th Foreign Affairs;
- 21st Legal and Constitutional Affairs;
- 22nd National Finance;
- 23rd Official Languages;
- 24th Regulations and other Statutory Instruments;
- 25th Social Affairs, Science and Technology;
- 26th Social Affairs, Science and Technology;
- 27th Standing Rules and Orders;
- 28th Regulations and other Statutory Instruments;—
(Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, these orders have now been on the order paper for some time. It will be recalled that Senator Roblin asked some questions about them and we obtained for him some further information. The orders have since been stood because Senator Roblin was interested in receiving further information. I provided him with some information, and I now have further details in terms of breakdown which I will be pleased to send to him.

I understand that Senator Roblin has since been in touch with the Table officers. I am not clear as to what he said exactly, but I understand that he has suggested that we not hold up these orders on his account. I believe Senator Phillips was going to check to see if that is so; but I suggest it will cover the situation if I send this material to Senator Roblin after we have given approval to these budgets.

I therefore move the adoption of these reports.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: These reports commence at Order of the Day No. 10?

Senator Frith: They are Orders of the Day Nos. 10 through 22, dealing with the sixteenth report through the twenty-eighth report inclusive; that is correct.

[Senator Lafond.]

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and reports adopted.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

FOURTEENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fourteenth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce (budget re study on tax reform in Canada), presented in the Senate on Thursday, June 11, 1987.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, the Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration Committee has approved this report. I therefore move its adoption.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

MOTION TO REFER INQUIRY ON REPORT ON FILM ENTITLED: "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS" TO SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE—DEBATE ADJOURNED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marshall calling the attention of the Senate to the motion adopted by the Senate on May 28, 1986, and passed by a vote of 28 for and 17 against, that the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology entitled: Production and Distribution of the National Film Board Production "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", tabled in the Senate on 15th April, 1986, be referred back to the Committee with instructions to consider and report upon the following:

Strike out page 20 and substitute

Recommendations

1. That after the titles of the film, the following disclaimer be added: "This film is a docu-drama and combines elements of both reality and fiction. It does not pretend to be an even-handed or chronological biography of Billy Bishop.

Although a Walter Bourne did serve as Bishop's mechanic, the film director has used this character to express his own doubts and reservations about Bishop's exploits. There is no evidence that these were shared by the real Walter Bourne."

2. That the National Film Board be requested to take action to eliminate from the film the unproven allegations, charges and innuendoes against the integrity of Billy Bishop; and further, that consideration be given to the apparent disregard by National Film Board officials to their commitments to the Senate Sub-committee on Veterans Affairs arising out of evidence before the Sub-committee.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I intend to complete my comments on the Billy Bishop inquiry today, no doubt to the relief of many honourable senators. I have attempted to address a case, which I hope will result in action, that will finally do justice to a Canadian war veteran and war hero, and also to defend his record, his reputation and his rights as a deceased comrade against what I have concluded to have been an unconscionable attempt by a government agency to denigrate, without question and without accountability to anyone—evidently even to the government itself—the record of that war hero, Air Marshal William Avery Bishop, VC, more than 60 years after the fact, and for reasons which I could not, which I cannot now, and which I never will be able to understand.

While I recognize that the original inquiry raised much controversy about the deliberations of the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs and the investigation of the the action of the National Film Board, I felt that at the time it was a reasonable and justifiable inquiry. I still feel that even more so today.

I suppose I could not use more appropriate words to define my gut feeling, to justify our action, than the words of Billy Bishop himself, who said:

It is a code of honour to help out any comrade who is in distress and no matter how severe the consequences may seem, there is only one thing to do: dash straight in and at least lend moral support to him.

I think we did that, honourable senators. But could we have done less as representatives of Parliament, who are led to believe that one of our responsibilities is to protect the rights of an individual? And we never had a better opportunity to fulfil that charge.

Honourable senators, I indicated in one of the phases of my inquiry how and why I became involved in the Billy Bishop affair; but over the past year I have become more concerned and bothered as events have proceeded, because it struck me that the controversy over Billy Bishop's heroism goes far beyond the doubt on the merits of his receiving the Victoria Cross, because for me it reaches into the heart and soul of our respect and loyalty to our country. It has to do with our traditional values and our nationhood, which the leaders of our country proclaim almost on a daily basis.

Perhaps I should mention in this regard the proclamation of National Citizenship Week, which was designated from April 12 to April 18 last. That proclamation recognized the entitlement to those rights and privileges, subject to the duties and responsibilities, which flow from being a Canadian citizen. To mark the occasion, we were called upon to reflect on what it means to be a Canadian, and we were asked to celebrate our citizenship and the beliefs and values which that embodies.

But what about the rights of that citizen, Billy Bishop—rights which are destroyed because of "freedom of expression," behind which statement government agencies can hide in order deliberately to raise doubt in the minds of our citizens about only one of 72 acts of heroism in war—and for what purpose?

I am bothered by, and I cannot understand the complacency of, those of our nation who have the influence to show by example how we feel about our country—and here I refer to the writers, critics, journalists and historians, and certainly those who are elected to or appointed by governments, to guide Canadians according to our Constitution, our history, and their duty and responsibility to all Canadians.

While we hear platitudes of how great a country this is and of the freedom we enjoy, we also hear about why our country is so great—and usually the words flow freely. They say that it is because Canadian citizens went to war in far-off lands to defend that freedom, and, as was reiterated time and time again, the battles in which Canadians fought and died represent the beginning of our nation, because of the sacrifice of our youth from coast to coast. It has also been said that it was the turning point in our history.

But, honourable senators, it suits our leaders—those I have mentioned—to allow and support a part of our government to play around with those pledges of loyalty to our veterans. Yet, one man or one small group of individuals can inflict on our traditional values their own version of what those Canadian citizens did in war, and raise doubt in the minds of Canadians, particularly our youth, whom we try to teach about peace and freedom, and try to explain the reasons why their counterparts of the same age, in another era, sacrificed their lives because their country asked them to.

Honourable senators, there are countless other expressions of loyalty and faith that have been uttered in our country which makes one wonder, but it would be too time-consuming to mention them. However, one that struck me very forcibly, and is appropriate to the issue, I found in an article in Reader's Digest on Pierre Berton's book Vimy. This man is one of our leading writers and authors, and I shall refer to the article. Pierre Berton said two things on two different occasions which, when taken together, strike me as contradictory and inconsistent. Mr. Berton is quoted in Reader's Digest—and I do not have the date—as saying the following:

"When we see pictures of Vimy veterans gathered round a cenotaph on Armistice Day, we forget that in 1917 most of those men were kids." Bob Owen, who joined up at 17, told Berton that, as his train pulled out of the Regina station, weeping mothers ran along the platform, reaching through windows to cling to the teenage sons they might never see again. Berton instantly saw the scene, and he cried when he described it.

Honourable senators, Billy Bishop had a mother, too. Yet, Mr. Berton criticizes the Senate for defending Bishop in most scathing words in a letter in the Globe and Mail of December 27, 1985. Mr. Berton said in that letter:

Instead of following the crowd of "Yahoo" senators who subjected Paul Cowan to an outrageous "kangaroo court", the Globe would have done better to hit hard at those shameful proceedings in Ottawa.

And these are the kinds of words that Mr. Macerola uses when he talks about cultural reality and creativity. Evidently, we senators do not have any right to freedom of expression because we happen to be senators. Here is another extract from the Reader's Digest article on Pierre Berton:

"I'd forgotten that the 100,000 Canadians at Vimy all had relatives, and so there are enormous numbers of people who care about Vimy because someone in their family fought there."

Billy Bishop fought there, too, flying overhead and protecting those 100,000 Canadians. He had relatives who cared, too, and his family is still wondering why they should be subjected to the defamation of his character by a government agency and producer whom Mr. Berton supports. Here is another extract from that article:

What Berton found most difficult was celebrating courage without celebrating war. "Five thousand Canadians died at Vimy," he points out, "and many others were crippled, or haunted by terrible memories, for the rest of their lives. But I recognized that Vimy was a moment of triumph, and that those gallant and ingenious young men who suffered the appalling hardships of trench warfare were heroes. I wrote Vimy because I felt their story should be told."

Here is what Mr. Berton said in his letter to the Globe and Mail of December 27, 1985, while our committee was hearing evidence and calling witnesses:

V.C.'s aren't given out with the rations but they are given for political reasons and morale-building reasons. Lesser medals, such as the military medal, are dealt out like cards.

At Vimy Ridge a group of soldiers of the 4th Division drew lots for them.

For Mr. Berton's information, and for the information of honourable senators, I looked up the qualifications for the Military Medal, and this is what the official wording says:

This medal was instituted in March 1916 for award to non-commissioned officers and men of the army for individual or associated acts of bravery brought to notice by the recommendation of a Commander-in-Chief in the field. The medal . . . bears on the obverse the royal effigy, and on the reverse the words "for bravery in the field", encircled by a wreath and surmounted by the royal cypher and crown. It may be awarded to women for devotion to duty under fire.

This was written back in 1916, some 70-odd years ago, and today we are just considering whether or not we should send women into battle. The description goes on:

The military medal can be awarded to warrant officers, first class and second class, for acts of bravery in the field in the same conditions as are prescribed for other ranks, as well as to personnel of the RAF for gallant service on the ground.

[Senator Marshall.]

These are the same men whom Pierre Berton was calling heroes—100,000 of them. Yet, he says that at Vimy these medals were dealt out like cards, and that lots were drawn for them. This foremost Canadian also said this in his letter to the newspaper:

The RFC and Canada both needed a hero in the Spring of 1917. The flying corps had just come through "Bloody April", the worst month of the war. It is quite plausible that "in search for a saint", . . . the corps winked at the lack of evidence and gave Bishop the VC on his word alone. Canada got its hero and it also got a warbond salesman: for Bishop became far too valuable to keep in the air. Back he came to this country on the speech circuit.

If Mr. Berton had been honest, he would have added that after Bishop did the speech circuit, as requested by his superiors, he returned to France and did another tour of duty, and had some 25 more kills, acts of bravery. Pierre Berton is one of our leading Canadian authors, who has been awarded the Order of Canada. I do not know, but maybe they draw cards at Government House for the distinctive award of the Order of Canada.

Honourable senators, I apologize for having probably spent too much time on Mr. Berton's contradictions on heroism, but those contradictions are so inappropriate for a historian and veteran who should be consistent in describing Canadian heroes.

I shall put on record some words that may seem appropriate about Canadians when I read an excerpt of comments by one of our own senators in this chamber. "The Canadian habit of selling our country short and demeaning our accomplishments tends to undermine our confidence as a nation." We should, rather, counteract—and I am paraphrasing—this negative influence, and we as Canadians must lead the way by demonstrating our optimism, our vitality and our pride in ourselves and in our country and in those who fought for us.

Honourable senators, I shall not be much longer, but I want to put on record two items from the evidence given before the committee. One excerpt is from Mr. Cowan's evidence, and one excerpt is from Mr. Macerola's evidence. I shall begin at a point in the evidence where Senator McElman is asking questions of Mr. Cowan:

Senator McElman: Explicitly, Mr. Cowan, what was the purpose that you expressed in that proposal of making the film on Billy Bishop?

A copy of that proposal was presented in evidence. Continuing with the quotation:

Mr. Cowan: I wanted to make a film which told the story of Billy Bishop as it has entered into legend in Canada; the story which essentially was told by the play, by the book, and which is in the history books of Canada.

Senator McElman: A short while ago you stated that when you began this exercise, you started to deal with Billy Bishop as a hero, and that in the course of your research you found witnesses who provided rumour or information that did not fit that picture. Therefore, the initial purpose changed as you proceeded.

What became the purpose, as you developed that research? What was your final conclusion as to the purpose of the film? What was its purpose as the act requires in the Canadian interest?

Mr. Cowan: I would say that the film's purpose was twofold: (1) to tell the story of Billy Bishop, and (2) to deal with the nature of heroism.

Senator McElman: What exactly does the "nature of heroism" mean?

Mr. Cowan: Specifically, in the film, it was to deal with how in the First World War this group of men were used as heroes to at least some degree to take people's minds off what was happening on the ground. It was to show how we needed to create heroes, because, in that particular war, the reality was just too terrible to deal with—at least for part of the population—directly. One of the ways that the population at that time was dealing with it was through heroes.

Senator McElman: Well, in the course of your research, you came to the conclusion that Billy Bishop was part of the process used by the authorities to make heroes for the Canadian people.

Mr. Cowan: I wouldn't use the word "process"; I would say it is a natural tendency to want to do that.

He is the expert. The quotation goes on:

Senator McElman: A natural tendency?

Mr. Cowan: Yes, in a country at wartime, among the high command during the war, absolutely.

Senator McElman: Then, when heroes didn't happen, they were made; is that your conclusion?

Mr. Cowan: Well, to some extent they were made. Of course there were real heroes; there is no question about it.

Honourable senators, there are many other descriptions which I have referred to before and, time being of the essence, I will skip over them. However, I think I made the point in the other phases in which I have spoken and in this short question and answer session by Senator McElman.

Mr. Macerola also gave evidence, and I have picked out some of the things that he said. The following is one of them:

It is our job to make films which reflect the cultural reality of our country and sometimes those films are controversial. Controversy means that people will differ, often strongly, even violently. Some of you will come down on one side of the controversy, some on the other. Surely you would not suggest that controversy be eliminated. There is no one here who will deny the importance of preserving freedom of expression; to do otherwise would be to go against a fundamental principle which is one of the underpinnings of democracy in this country.

He went on to say:

Our objective was rather to question, and to do so in good faith and with a great deal of respect for the events and individuals involved. We acted responsibly and professionally, and firmly believe that the Canadian public is aware enough, and adult enough, to make its own judgment. And that is precisely what this film asks them to do.

Honourable senators will be aware that 3,000 Canadians, mostly from the RCAF Association, judged what they had done pretty quickly, and wrote letters accordingly.

Mr. Macerola then went on to say, and put some emphasis on the fact that:

The film was conceived as a docu-drama, shot as a docu-drama, and in our own minds—that is, in Macerola's mind, and talking about his colleagues—clearly released as a docu-drama. As with some other docu-dramas released by the National Film Board, I have decided to label it as such. The film will carry a statement that it is a docu-drama presenting a perspective on the nature of heroism and the legend of Billy Bishop.

Honourable senators, I put on the record the following: How is it that Symansky and Cowan both made the same statement, and the film is still being shown without a disclaimer? They denied that they would use our disclaimer, and said they would use their own, but they are still not showing it. Honourable senators, why did they call this film a documentary, and accept awards for it as a documentary, when Mr. Macerola says so clearly that the film was conceived as a docu-drama, shot as a docu-drama, and in their own mind clearly released as a docu-drama? Perhaps they should give back the awards.

Mr. Macerola went on to say:

One of the most important functions expected of me as Commissioner of the National Film Board is to be the guarantor, the watchdog so to speak, of the independence of the Board in all aspects of the creative process of filmmaking. If I failed to fulfill this task, Parliamentarians would be the first, and rightly so, to criticize my performance.

Honourable senators, we, as members of the Subcommittee on Veterans Affairs, and many others complied. He then went on to say:

My duty is to live up to these legal and conventional obligations. If Parliament wishes to give itself the power to shelve, or the power to order the National Film Board to make specific films in a specific way, then Parliament must amend the National Film Act to reflect such a change.

Honourable senators, he hit the nail right on the head! We as parliamentarians should be able to do that, and we should not wait for the minister responsible for communications to say that the National Film Board is at arm's length and the government cannot do anything about it.

Until such changes are made, and I doubt whether any Senator would want to see such changes made,— the responsibility for releasing or recalling films rests with the National Film Board of Canada. It is a responsibility I will continue to assume and fulfill as long as I hold the position entrusted to me by the Government under an Act of Parliament.

Honourable senators, he is wrong there. We want to see changes.

Honourable senators, someone said that the service and deeds of Billy Bishop were real. However, in the National Film Board film reality has become such a commodity that it can be twisted to make statements that must be called into question. The same writer said that Paul Cowan meddled with Billy Bishop's life with artistic licence when, in fact, he had cut the underpinning of art—the truth.

Before I conclude, honourable senators, there are at least four good reasons why this chamber should re-commit the report on the production and distribution of the National Film Board Production "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" to the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

First, the status of the Senate's recommendations has been left in doubt. It might indeed be argued that, in effect, the Senate has adopted no recommendations, if the matter is left as it stands.

Second, the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss" is still being shown without any disclaimers or explanations of the techniques used to give authority to Mr. Cowan's opinions, and this is still continuing. Consequently, viewers of all ages, and school children in particular, continue to be misled. Honourable senators, they disregard what they agreed to when they appeared before our committee, and continue to show the film without disclaimers.

Third, two governments and several Ministers of Communications have been unwilling to act in this matter and to instruct the National Film Board to withdraw, re-edit or even to attach a disclaimer to the film. As I have shown, there is sufficient controversy over the docu-drama style of film-making for the government to, at least, adopt a general policy that all such films, made at public expense, should contain a brief disclaimer outlining the techniques used by the film-maker to dramatize his or her work and point of view.

In closing, honourable senators, I can do no better than to use the words of my colleague, Senator Molson, prior to his motion on May 13, 1986:

The report of the Senate committee clearly indicates that damage has been done by the film, "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss." Damage has been done to our national image, to our pride, to all those who served to protect our liberty and our way of life, to the families of those who gave their lives and, last, but not least, to the members of Billy Bishop's family. Perhaps I should add that damage has been done to the National Film Board itself.

Honourable senators, the National Film Board has a great reputation, but they made a serious mistake and it should be corrected to their own advantage. Senator Molson continued:

There are undoubtedly millions of Canadians who look to us to have the courage and clarity of vision to correct the unjust and unjustified attack on this country's leading hero of World War 1. We must accept our responsibility.

Therefore, honourable senators, I move, seconded by Senator Phillips, that this inquiry be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Jean Le Moyné: Honourable senators need not worry; I shall be very brief. My esteemed colleague, Senator Marshall, knows how deeply I sympathize with him in the matter of the NFB's film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", as I do with those of our colleagues who spoke so vigorously their indignation, and also with the learned and distinguished witnesses he called to the defence of Billy Bishop's honour during the hearings of his Subcommittee on Veteran's Affairs last year. I welcome the opportunity to assure him that my feelings about that false documentary of the NFB remain the same, that I still consider it as a mean and lousy piece of work on all counts. I want to tell him again that I deplore the stubbornness of the NFB's management concerning the rectification asked by the subcommittee.

In a previous speech the honourable senator quoted the three ministers successively competent in this matter, the Honourable Francis Fox, the Honourable Marcel Masse and the Honourable Flora MacDonald, who all declined to intervene, because they said it would be inappropriate. Senator Marshall called that the "standard line," and that is what it is. It is also, I regret to declare, the line I had adopted resolutely, though reluctantly, during the preparation of the report, and then modestly developed in my speech of April 22, 1986.

It is still my position. It does not at all correspond to my feelings, but I am bound to keep it. Despite the outrage felt by Senator Marshall, his friends and a large portion of the Canadian public, I think a hands-off policy regarding our cultural agencies is wise. It is not, of course, without risks, but in my view we must accept them or inaugurate a regime of cultural censorship. We must find some more evolved means, if I dare say so, of ensuring the proper cultural uses of public money. In that spirit, I second the motion of my colleague.

In conclusion, I wish to say that Senator Marshall has always been of a great forbearance with me. He has, indeed, always been for me the kindest of Liberals.

On motion of Senator Petten, debate adjourned.

VISITORS IN GALLERY

REPRESENTATIVES OF NATIONAL PRISONERS OF WAR ASSOCIATION

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I should like to bring to the attention of the Senate the presence in the gallery of a gallant group of people from the National Prisoners of War Association. Representatives of that association presented a brief to the Senate Subcommittee on Veterans' Affairs.

The group is led by Mr. Ray Smith, President, and includes Mrs. Dulcie Johnson, Women's Brief Chairman; Mr. Robert Large, Past President; Mrs. Dorothy Musgrove, Widow of the Past President; Mr. Bruno MacDonald, Service Officer; and Mr. Des Ewin, Editor of the publication "The Journal".

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Seventh Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (post-secondary education) tabled in the Senate on 25th March, 1987.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should like to say that I do not intend to speak on this item. I think that next week we should finally say, "If no other senator wishes . . .," et cetera. I am simply holding this open for someone else. As a matter of fact, I do not know who originated the motion, but that person may want to close the debate.

Order stands.

SENIOR CITIZENS

OBSERVATION OF SPECIAL WEEK IN TRIBUTE

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Croll, seconded by the Honourable Senator Robertson:

That the Senate recommends to the Government of Canada and to individuals and organizations in Canada that, in honour of the senior citizens of this country, the last complete week of August of this year and of each and every year thereafter, be kept and observed throughout Canada as "Senior Citizens' Week" as a way of paying tribute to the diverse contributions being made to Canada by the older citizens of our society.—(Honourable Senator Marshall).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, when I was acting government whip, I adjourned this item in my name. I am not going to say anything on the matter. If any other senators wish to speak on the item, they are welcome to do so.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: If no other senator wishes to speak on this order, is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

MOTION TO AUTHORIZE SUBCOMMITTEE ON TRAINING AND EMPLOYMENT TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE WITHDRAWN

On the calling of Motion No. 6:

By the Honourable Senator Gigantès:

That the Sub-Committee on Training and Employment of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology have power to sit while the Senate is sitting on Monday, June 29, 1987, and that Rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: With leave, honourable senators, I should like to withdraw this motion.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion withdrawn.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE—MOTION RE WITNESSES' EXPENSES ADOPTED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition), pursuant to notice of June 16, 1987, moved:

That the provisions of rule 83 of the Rules of the Senate with respect to the payment of expenses of witnesses shall apply to witnesses appearing before the Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, on a point of order; the Scroll I received terminates at Motion No. 7.

Senator Frith: But the order paper does not. If you look at the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate, you will see that there are three motions standing in my name; they are Motion No. 8, Motion No. 9 and Motion No. 10.

Honourable senators, rule 83 states:

The Clerk of the Senate is authorized to pay every witness invited or summoned to attend before a select committee a reasonable sum for living and travelling expenses of the witness, upon the certificate of the clerk of the committee attesting to the fact that the witness attended before the committee by invitation or summons.

The definition of a "select committee" is:

"select committee" means a committee composed of less than the whole body of senators and includes both a standing committee and a special committee;

That does not include the Committee of the Whole, but since we have established a Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake accord, it seems reasonable that if the steering committee invites or summons a witness to attend, the same provision should apply. That is why I move this motion.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE—MOTION RE SEATING OF WITNESSES ADOPTED

• (1530)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition), pursuant to notice of June 16, 1987, moved:

That any witnesses called before the Committee of the Whole be permitted to sit on the floor of the Senate at a special table provided for that purpose.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I would like to know why they would sit on the floor and not a chair.

Senator Frith: In this case the word "floor" is used to distinguish between the floor of the Senate, the seats of the senators, and the gallery. However, Senator Leblanc's point is well taken. If I had moved the motion in French, this ambiguity might not have arisen.

Honourable senators, we have had the experience of witnesses, other than ministers, appearing before the Committee of the Whole which dealt with the agreement on fisheries and boundaries between Canada and France. Usually, when a minister appears before the Committee of the Whole in regard to a bill, he sits in one of the seats allocated to senators, with his experts seated at a table on the floor of the chamber. When dealing with the Canada-France Agreement, we used the system which we have in place now, that is, the table in the middle between the English reporters' desks and the Senate table where the Mace is placed.

This motion is simply to provide that accommodation shall be given to the witnesses in that portion of the Senate, namely, the centre aisle.

Senator Phillips, Senator Doody, some other senators and I have reservations about how well this system worked. Although someone reading the debates may have trouble visualizing the problem, it is that the table is placed virtually in the middle of the aisle, which means that the witnesses must have their backs to certain senators. The solution, it would seem to me, would be to have the witnesses either sit close to where Black Rod sits or, if we can arrange it, at the other end of the chamber. I agree with Senators Doody and Phillips that we should discuss this matter.

This motion merely moves that the witnesses be permitted to sit on the floor of the Senate, but I accept that when the motion is passed it will be understood that we will talk about improving the actual location of the table.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I would agree with the motion, subject to a relocation of the table. On the previous occasion when this method was used, half of the senators were unable to see the witnesses, and it strikes me as being similar to having the witness with his back to the members of the jury. I believe that would be entirely out of place as it relates to our procedure, and that there should be a relocation of the table.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I am prepared to put that undertaking on the record. If the motion passes, it will merely establish that the witnesses will be seated on the floor of the Senate, and the understanding is that we will improve the location of the table in relation to where it was situated when dealing with the Canada-France Agreement.

Motion agreed to.

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE—MOTION TO TELEWISE PROCEEDINGS—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition), pursuant to notice of June 16, 1987, moved:

That pool television cameras be permitted in the Senate Chamber for the purpose of recording the proceedings of a Committee of the Whole with respect to its hearings on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to; and

That the proceedings be televised pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons.

He said: Honourable senators, I should explain that as this motion is worded it does not contemplate a round-the-clock televising of our proceedings in Committee of the Whole, as is the case with televising proceedings in the House of Commons. The House of Commons rules are invoked, but not for the purpose of establishing the system that is used there. That is a system which I think we ought to introduce into the Senate, but I think it requires further investigation since there are associated costs. There are no costs to the Senate associated with the proposal I am making, because the lights are already installed. I suppose, to be strictly correct, there would be the cost of the electricity for the lights, but that is the only cost that would be incurred so far as the Senate is concerned if this motion is adopted.

Honourable senators, the motion is that "... pool television cameras be permitted..." The motion is not that they be installed but that they be permitted to come in when, and for whatever reasons, the media wish to report our proceedings. At that time up to three cameras could be placed in this chamber, but they would be placed with the restrictions that apply in the House of Commons. The ground rules are those established in the second paragraph of the motion that "... the proceedings be televised pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons."

It is important, honourable senators, to note the two paragraphs. In the first paragraph the key words are "be permitted", and in the second paragraph the key words are "pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons."

The steering committee or the Committee of the Whole would designate someone to deal with the television networks. It could be Mr. Lovelace, the Clerk, the Clerk Assistant, Mr. Greene, or whoever we want to designate. That person would be contacted by the network or the networks who wish to televise, and they would be permitted to televise in accordance with the established ground rules.

I understand that those ground rules include such things as no wandering cameras to televise empty seats, no televising of reactions, and so on. The ground rules are that they televise the witnesses and the people who are speaking.

I have been told that Senator Murray did take the position, although not here, that he had no objection to the televising of the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole, provided the Senate could afford it. Perhaps Senator Phillips, or one of Senator Murray's colleagues, might confirm whether that is Senator Murray's position. I would point out again, honourable senators, that I think we can afford the cost of the electricity for the lights, and I believe Senator Murray would agree to that.

Honourable senators, the purpose of the motion is to permit the television networks to televise those portions of the proceedings in which they are interested during the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake constitutional accord.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, may I direct a question to Senator Frith?

Would he include, as an appendix to today's Debates, a copy of the rules covering broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons? I believe honourable senators should have the benefit of seeing that before proceeding with the motion.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think that is a good idea. I will attempt to have that circulated for Monday, or have it appended if I can get it in time. However, I will see that all senators have it before we continue with the debate. I believe that is a reasonable request.

On motion of Senator Phillips, for Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, June 22, 1987, at 2 p.m.

PATENT EXTENSION (ASPARTAME) BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-259, to extend the term of a patent relating to a certain additive.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave, at the next sitting of the Senate.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before His Honour asks if leave is granted, I wonder if I might ask a question of the Deputy Leader of the Government about this bill. According to the proceedings in the other place, this bill received three readings in one sitting. I believe it was last Thursday. It is a private members' public bill, if that is the right designation. The Deputy Leader of the Government is asking for an abridgement of the time to one day instead of two days. That gives the impression that this bill is now a government bill.

If this bill is to remain as a private member's public bill, I wonder whether the Senate should consider expediting such a bill when we have a couple of private bills of some importance to us languishing in the other place. In particular, one of the Senate bills is Bill S-5, which deals with laws prohibiting marriage between related persons, and it is languishing there now in its third incarnation. This bill is important to us, because our intention is to avoid having such petitions coming to us for exemptions from the general law on marriage. I am told that presently there is a long line-up of such petitions waiting to be presented, and, of course, they would be unnecessary if this bill were passed.

Senate private bills, be they private or public private bills, do not receive, to put it mildly, a high priority or expeditious treatment in the other place. In fact, House of Commons Standing Order 41(1) reads:

The order for the first consideration of any subsequent stages of a bill already considered during Private Members' Business, of second reading of a private bill and of second reading of a private Member's public bill originating in the Senate shall be placed at the bottom of the order of precedence.

Honourable senators, since we have those two bills over there and another private bill coming up, perhaps, if the other place expects us to give speedy treatment to their bills, it is time that we did a bit of negotiating with them and reminded them that they give the opposite treatment to our bills. Is this bill going to become a government bill?

Senator Doody: No, honourable senators. To my knowledge, this bill is still a private member's public bill and will be treated as such. The urgency of this particular bill at this time relates to the particular patent for the artificial sweetener mentioned in the bill which will expire in early July. There is great interest in the particular part of the country involved in having this patent protected. It involves erecting a new building, creating new jobs, and so on, and to that end we are hoping to have the bill expedited. However, I can well understand the concern of my honourable colleague—

Senator Frith: It is a sort of mini Bill C-22.

Senator Doody: —across the way. This is not a patent medicine. This is an artificial sweetener or a food additive. It is quite separate and distinct from Bill C-22.

Senator Frith: Only in a chemical sense; not in a legislative or political sense.

Senator Doody: Then further along the same line of linkage, as the honourable senator suggests, I certainly will take it up with the leadership in the other place to see if steps cannot be taken to expedite the bills that have gone from this place to the House of Commons, and I shall report back.

However, in the meantime, if leave is not given for this particular bill today, it will take its normal place on the order paper.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Some Hon. Senators: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it then the wish of honourable senators to have this bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next, June 25, 1987?

Senator Frith: You do not need leave for that.

Hon. Senators: Carried

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading on Thursday next, June 25, 1987.

TAX REFORM

WHITE PAPER AND RELATED DOCUMENTS—NOTICE OF MOTION

On the tabling of documents:

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, with respect to the white paper on tax reform and the series of documents that have just been tabled by the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce is subject to a motion to study the principles that were enunciated.

Therefore, I give notice that at the next sitting of the Senate I will move to have all of these documents that have been referred to today dealing with the subject of tax reform referred to the committee.

Honourable senators, I may have a few more words to say when the motion is called, but I should say that this whole matter of tax reform is not as marvellous as some of the rhetoric would have everyone believe. However, suffice it to say that I will be moving to have this matter referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce in due course.

CHILD CARE

NATIONAL POLICY—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Mira Spivak: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, June 25, 1987, I will call the attention of the Senate to the question of a national policy on child care.

CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, YEAR OF PROCLAMATION (NEWFOUNDLAND ACT)—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, June 25, 1987, I will move:

That, whereas section 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province to which the amendment applies;

1. (1) Section 3 of the Newfoundland Act is renumbered as subsection 3(1).

(2) Section 3 of the said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

3. This amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, year of proclamation (Newfoundland Act).

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Murray is not with us today. He is away on business.

TAX REFORM

WHITE PAPER—TWENTY CONSULTANTS—FEMALE REPRESENTATION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, last week the Leader of the Government in the Senate was asked if there were any women serving as members of the income tax advisory group or the sales tax advisory group to the Minister of Finance. I do not know whether there is a response forthcoming in Delayed Answers. We now have the list of the people who served on those committees. It is impossible to tell from the list whether they are men or women. When the Leader of the Government is seeking a response to that question, I wonder if he would also seek a response to the following question.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

FREE TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—ADVISORY GROUP—FEMALE REPRESENTATION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: The Prime Minister has an advisory group in connection with the trade initiative. I understand that that committee is composed of Canadians from coast to coast. Could we have a list of members serving on that committee, with their gender identified?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I shall make inquiries, senator.

AGRICULTURE

SPECIAL GRAINS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EXPEDITING OF PAYMENTS

Hon. Daniel Hays: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate relating to the payment to farmers under the Special Grains Program.

There was $1 billion set aside last year, $300 million of which was paid out last year. The balance should have been paid by now, and I believe most of it has been paid. The balance of the money was sent out during the week of June 8. The payments were sent out pursuant to statutory declarations completed by the applicants, which were to have been returned by March 31. Some farmers have not received the payment, because there was a change in the assumption that was made by the government and the actual information received at the time the statutory declarations were filed. These farmers have been advised that it will be some three weeks before this matter is addressed by the appropriate department.

My question is this: Will the deputy leader do what he can to see that this process is expedited so that the farmers who have amended their returns, in most cases to claim a lower amount than originally allocated to them, receive these payments as soon as possible, particularly in light of the tremendous financial stress that is being experienced in that community now?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I thank Senator Hays for his concern. I will see that the minister is so informed.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government would get us additional information with regard to this payout of funds. Honourable senators will recall that the bill which provides authorization for this payout of money was before us just before the end of March. At that time we were told that the bill had to be through before the end of the fiscal year. Could the Deputy Leader of the Government provide the Senate with a list of the dates on which the major payouts to farmers under that Appropriation Act were in fact made?

Senator Doody: I shall ask for such a list, senator.

BELL CANADA BILL

SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bielish, for the second reading of the Bill C-13, An Act respecting the reorganization of Bell Canada.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION BILL, 1987

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Heath Macquarrie moved the second reading of Bill C-18, respecting national transportation.

He said: Honourable senators, if during the next few minutes some of my colleagues who are versed in Scripture think of a well-quoted portion of Genesis 27, verse 22, I will be the first to understand.

Honourable senators, our transportation system is vital to the everyday lives of Canadians in all regions of our country, and it plays a special role in tying together this vast country, both socially and economically. More than 1.4 million tonnes of freight now move by rail, truck or water every day in Canada, not including the freight that is moved by private trucking. Passenger traffic on Canadian airlines has more than tripled since 1967, to a total of 24 million people in 1984. Our transportation system also has a great potential to add to our economic growth and development in the future.

This legislation will increase competition in air, rail, marine and trucking. It will set out the framework for our transportation industry to provide the best possible service at the best price to shippers and air passengers throughout the country. The benefits go beyond a more competitive transportation system; cost-efficient transportation will create opportunities for expansion and development in industries across Canada. That means more jobs for Canadians in primary production, in resource processing and in manufacturing in all regions of this great land.

Honourable senators, this bill was the subject of very thorough study in the other place. It was referred to the Standing Committee on Transport, which held hearings all across Canada. Prior to that, in 1985, the same committee heard witnesses from one end of the country to the other on the basic policy principles in the "Freedom to Move" paper. In addition, the Minister of Transport and his officials conducted extensive consultations with provincial and territorial governments, hundreds of shippers and carriers and dozens of interested groups on all aspects of the bill and received countless written submissions. As a result, every interested party in the country has been heard and, more important I believe—and this is obvious—listened to.

The bill tabled in the house contained elements which differed from the “freedom to move” proposals. Most notable is the special regime of regulation to protect air services in the north.

The bill, as approved by the House of Commons, contains some further modifications resulting from submissions to the standing committee and the minister. I can cite two examples, and they are protection to the disabled persons to access the transportation system in a fair and dignified manner, and the deletion of terminal running rights for railways due to the potential impact on smaller, federally-regulated railways, such as the Algoma Central Railway and the Essex Terminal Railway. I apologize for not being able to give a Prince Edward Island example!

We have before us a made-in-Canada transportation policy that reflects this country's special needs and concerns. I have no hesitation in recommending approval of this bill, and trust that its approval will be forthcoming, since all viewpoints have been thoroughly considered in the lower house.

This bill is about economic efficiency, but the government and the Minister of Transport have a responsibility to ensure a safe as well as an efficient, transportation system. The first priority will always be, and must always be, safety. We have an excellent safety record in all modes of transport. That record must be maintained, and improved wherever possible. The government has taken, or soon will take, action on this priority on all transportation modes. This Parliament has already passed major amendments to the Aeronautics Act and the Canada Shipping Act.

Comprehensive regulations for the transportation of dangerous goods were introduced in 1985. Last October the federal-provincial and territorial Ministers of Transport endorsed a uniform national safety code for trucks and buses. In March of this year they signed an agreement including the details of the code, the timing of its implementation, and the funding arrangements associated with it.

In the fall a new rail safety act will be proposed to set the right stage for maintaining and improving our safety record in rail, and legislation will be introduced to create an independent board to investigate accidents in the air, rail and marine modes. For the first time, the clear commitment of the government to safety in all modes will be enshrined in clause 3 of Bill C-18.

That policy statement also reiterates that our transportation system must be efficient, effective and adequate—this sounds something like “western senatism”, but it is not. It goes on to add the two important principles missing in the current act—principles which are critical to our future economic growth.

Transportation exists to serve the needs of shippers and travellers. Competition and market forces, wherever possible, should be the prime agents in providing viable and effective transportation service. These principles, hardly revolutionary, represent a major shift in the philosophy of regulation of transportation in Canada.

The current regulatory regime was put in place in 1967. Since then, honourable senators, the world economy, Canada's economy and our transportation industry have changed significantly and profoundly. The regulatory regime for transportation in Canada has not kept pace. As a result, our regulatory regime today tends to impede rather than support economic development. It reduces the competitiveness of our producers and the free movement of goods and people. That is why this bill is known as the “freedom to move” legislation. It will affect air travellers, consumers and businesses throughout Canada. Businesses of all types, from small family operated concerns to large integrated corporations, from manufacturers to primary resource producers, will finally have some alternatives for getting their output to market. Such a system is needed for overall economic growth and for enduring development in our regional economies.

Bill C-18 recognizes that transportation is the key to regional economic development, and that commercial concerns should be balanced with regional development concerns. An efficient, effective and competitive transportation system is a prerequisite for lasting economic development in any and all regions. The new National Transportation Act gives us such a system.

Enduring and meaningful jobs will be created or maintained in all regions wherever better transportation service, at a better price, will make a resource producer, a manufacturer, or other business, more competitive in the marketplace.

I would now like to turn, honourable senators, to the specifics of Bill C-18, the National Transportation Act of 1987.

This bill contains reforms in air, rail, trucking and marine transportation. It creates a new regulatory agency and establishes effective dispute-resolving mechanisms.

In the air mode, economic regulation of air services will be significantly reduced. No longer will virtually every aspect of airline operations be regulated, from the setting of fares and tariffs to the establishing of routes, schedules and the type of aircraft to be used. The test of public convenience and necessity that has been used to limit entry and restrict competition in the airline industry will be abolished. A new airline company will have to be Canadian controlled and obtain adequate liability insurance. More importantly, it will have to prove that it can meet the safety standards of the Aeronautics Act, modern, strict standards, thanks to the amendment passed by Parliament in 1985. Thus, every airline must be safe in order to get and to keep an operating licence.

There will be no ongoing regulation of domestic tariffs. The fare increases on routes served by only one carrier will be appealable to the National Transportation Agency. Confidential contracts for air cargo will be allowed.

These reforms will encourage new companies to enter the air transport market and existing companies to offer new services. They will encourage competition and innovation in both prices and services that will benefit air cargo shippers as well as travellers.

For our many small communities, this new freedom to move will mean much better service and competitive fares. Large carriers with large aircraft and inconvenient or infrequent services will increasingly be replaced by smaller entrepreneurs who know local conditions and requirements to provide convenient and more frequent service. Jet aircraft, inefficient on short hops or half full, will be replaced by more suitable aircraft, operating efficiently at affordable prices and at more convenient times.

This change is already occurring in many parts of the country, and frequent flyers are, in large measure, pleased with the greater choice they now have. Since I arose at the crack of dawn today to come to the Senate from Charlottetown to honour my responsibilities, I took note of the fact that in the Charlottetown airport this sort of thing is happening right now. We had four offerings of airlines; different sized planes serving the centres that are not so far apart. It seemed to me to be an efficient development, which will, I believe, be helpful economically, and most certainly will be of value to the passengers desiring service.

In addition, many of the new regional air carriers are using Canadian-made aircraft, in particular, the Dash-7s and Dash-8s made by de Havilland. These are splendid aircraft. This is a terrific spinoff, creating jobs in another important sector of our economy.

For the northern parts of the country, Bill C-18 contains some very important safeguards for the special interests of the northern shippers, carriers and communities. Many northern communities depend on regular air service to obtain medical supplies, food and other necessities of life. Often air service is the only year-round means of transport. As in the south, airlines will have to be Canadian controlled, have insurance and, above all, be safe.

In addition, any interested party who feels that a new service in the north would jeopardize existing essential services may file an objection with the new National Transportation Agency. If the objector can demonstrate that the proposed new service would lead to a significant negative impact on the existing service, the licence will not be issued.

To ensure that fares remain at reasonable levels, the National Transportation Agency may, on complaint, reduce any fare it finds to be unreasonable.

Northern shippers, carriers and residents have all indicated that they would welcome increased competition, but at a gradual and controlled rate. This regime is designed to do just that.

Many northern communities also rely on marine transport for vital re-supply services, and the shipping season is short in the north. As a result, it is doubly important that marine operations be reliable. The new provisions for northern marine service have been tailor-made with this special consideration in mind.

[Senator Macquarrie.]

Honourable senators, Bill C-18 also alters significantly the ground rules for Canada's railways, shippers and carriers. Under the current legislation, competition between the railways is limited and, in practice, often non-existent. For example, railway companies are now free to discuss jointly and set freight rates, and all rates must be made public through the Canadian Transportation Commission. In other words, a shipper and a carrier cannot privately negotiate a contract in the way in which businesses ordinarily do. As a result, our railways now operate below maximum efficiency. They lose business to rail carriers in the United States, where private contracts are permitted, and to trucking. Bill C-18 will provide for such contracts as part of an overall plan to encourage efficiency and competition in the rail sector.

With respect to branch line abandonments, the new agency and the Minister of Transport will be given many more options for dealing with applications than heretofore existed. The options now are to order the abandonment of branch lines which are losing money, or to order them retained and subsidize the railway's losses. Under Bill C-18 short line operators will be encouraged to take over branch lines. In addition, the Minister of Transport will be able to use moneys, which otherwise would be spent to subsidize the line, to help shippers and communities adjust to an alternate service such as trucking.

Bill C-18 also contains two competitive access provisions—extended interswitching limits and competitive line rates—which are designed to give greater bargaining power on rates and service to captive shippers. Railways will in future have to compete with one another for traffic from these shippers. The dispute resolution provisions, mediation and arbitration are an especially important feature of the legislation. They place the onus squarely on the parties involved to attempt to settle conflicts before turning to the agency.

Honourable senators, the government is committed to a viable railway industry, without which we could not get many products to market. Financial viability of the railways can be compatible with competition, despite the railways' assertion to the contrary. Provided that they offer an efficient service to meet the shippers' needs, railways can compete effectively, and their financial viability will not be jeopardized.

Turning to trucking, honourable senators, there are again some important regulatory reforms. The new National Transportation Act contains provisions which would greatly reduce the regulation of extraprovincial trucking if it were applied. They will not be applied, because since 1954 the federal government has delegated its regulatory responsibilities for extraprovincial trucking to the provinces. Each province subsequently developed its own regulatory regime. In different provinces there are different requirements for entry, for routes, for rates, for commodities, for safety precautions, and so on. Through extensive consultations over many years, the federal and provincial governments, the industry, the producers and the shippers reached a broad consensus that we need less regulation and more uniformity in regulation of trucking across Canada.

An historic agreement on regulatory reform of the trucking industry was signed in February 1985 by all of the provinces, the territories and the federal government. The new Motor Vehicle Transport Act, Bill C-19, will put that agreement into law. Since that bill will shortly be considered, it will not be necessary to go into its provisions at this time.

Honourable senators, this "freedom to move" legislation is designed to meet the unique transportation needs of our country and our circumstances. It is truly a "made-in-Canada" policy, which balances the interests of all and benefits all Canadians. It will contribute to a vibrant economy, where businesses can get their products to market at competitive prices without facing unnecessary obstacles. It will lead to more jobs in stronger regional economies—stronger because there is a more reliable, efficient transportation system serving businesses there. It will provide for road, rail, air and marine services that can deliver goods and people efficiently and effectively. It will bring about competitive fares for air travellers. It will result in flexible transportation networks that can adapt to new demands for services and new market opportunities. It will protect those who need protection, at all times safeguarding the public interest, including the highest public interest, that of safety. That is an important part of the "made-in-Canada" package.

The government has recognized the need for change and has developed the necessary legislation in consultation with all concerned. As I said at the outset, everyone has been listened to and many adjustments have been made.

The government places a high priority on this legislation, and it believes that now is the time to get on with the job of making these reforms a reality.

● (1430)

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I want to make it clear that I am not speaking on behalf of the Liberal Party or anyone else. I am speaking only for myself. I am concerned about this legislation, because this deregulating spree that we are on in Canada could cause hardship in the maritime and Atlantic provinces. The honourable senator has talked about flying in the new Dash-7 and Dash-8, which are Canadian built. I can tell honourable senators that one effect that can be seen right now is that the two main airlines are gradually leaving the airports in New Brunswick. They are being replaced by Air Atlantic and Air Nova, and they have hired people at lower wages—and this is only the beginning.

I am concerned, because this country was built on transportation and transportation subsidies, which made it possible for rail transportation to operate from both the western and eastern ends of this country. I hope that I am wrong, but I am afraid that we will see happening in the Atlantic provinces that which has already happened in some parts of the United States, where the major companies have gobbled up all of the traffic and have bought up the smaller companies, and those areas are left with either a poorer service or no service at all.

I am afraid that in the long run the only people who will be left in the transportation business in the Atlantic provinces will be the major companies, who eventually will be able to charge whatever the traffic will bear. I do not believe that this is the way to go in helping economically areas that are in need of support at either end of this country. I cannot speak for the western part of the country. I know that it has a greater population and probably more traffic.

I repeat that I hope that I am wrong. I listened very carefully to what was said at those meetings of the committee which I was able to attend. I know that this is something that was started by the other government. I believe that the people of the Atlantic provinces have good reason to feel concerned, and I can only hope that all of the good things mentioned by my colleague from Prince Edward Island will come about, and that we shall see none of the bad things about which I am concerned. However, I am not anxiously waiting to see this kind of legislation come into effect in my part of the country.

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, perhaps the mover would permit a question. Did I take it from his remarks, when he was referring to the matter being dealt with promptly and said, "Since all viewpoints have been dealt with in the committee of the other house, extensive hearings have been held and everyone has been listened to"—does that mean that we are to contemplate passing this 184-page piece of legislation without proper committee study in this house?

I will simply remind honourable senators that one of the last occasions that we had a transportation bill of this magnitude was in connection with the Canada Shipping Act amendments of some years ago, which were equally carefully examined in the other house. It went to a committee of the Senate, and we found that it was such a shemuzzle that we came up with 114 amendments of which the government of the day accepted 104. So I do hope that there is no suggestion here that this bill should not go to a proper Senate committee to be thoroughly examined.

Senator Macquarrie: In response to that question from my colleague, naturally I am not suggesting that any legislative body should refrain from questioning legislation if such questioning is considered necessary. I was merely bringing honourable senators up to date on what had taken place in the other chamber. There was an enormously lengthy questioning process in the other place. I quoted what was clearly the view of the government spokesman that many views had been heard and had been carefully listened to. Therefore, in bringing the legislation to this chamber, I was bringing the Senate up to date on the investigatory role that had already been done in the other place.

● (1440)

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I wonder if the honourable senator would permit a question.

Senator Macquarrie: Yes.

Senator Sinclair: The honourable senator said on more than one occasion that the purpose of the bill, and, indeed, it is a necessary part of the Canadian web and woof, was a viable rail industry. He also said that Bill C-18 would improve and enhance competition and "cost efficiency". I wonder if the honourable senator would help us by defining "cost efficiency", as it applies to rail transport in that bill.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, if the honourable Senator Sinclair wants a lesson from me on such things as cost efficiency in transportation, or in any other area of economic activity in this country, he may not be asking the right person. However, if he wishes to put any specific questions to me, I guarantee him that I shall go to authorities whose knowledge is even greater and fuller than my own and get him authoritative answers.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have one such question, and that is with respect to redundancy as applied to plants and people in rail transportation.

Senator Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I became interested in railways when I was in knee socks. There was an argument going on then about efficiency, about regulation and about competition. I remember the phrase "amalgamation never, competition ever," that sounds like the great Robert Manion. I see in this bill an effort on the part of those who have promoted the legislation to increase efficiency by allowing more competition and more practical measures to deal with things that have gone into economic problem areas. I do not think it takes a genius or a tycoon to know that flying great, large jet aircraft from Sydney to New Glasgow, or from Truro to Charlottetown, given the small geographic area and small population of the maritimes, as opposed to the process whereby Air Nova makes short runs from New Glasgow to Charlottetown, or Air Atlantic makes short runs from Yarmouth to Saint John, is a project worth looking at. I think the new system will work. I have seen evidence of it. The commuter age is upon us, and I think it is practical to start such a project.

Senator Sinclair: My question was about rail. I do not know how we got to Air Nova. It is not a rail operation. At least, it was not when I looked at it.

Senator Phillips: It is the question; it was not very plain. On motion of Senator Turner, debate adjourned.

PATENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Cogger, seconded by the Honourable Senator David, for the second reading of the Bill C-22, An Act to amend the Patent Act and to provide for certain matters in relation thereto.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, before we stand this order, Senator Doody has consistently pointed out that he does not intend to intervene in the debate on this bill and has invited anyone else who wishes to speak to do so. I assume that he has been standing it awaiting the report of the special committee studying the subject matter of this bill.

[Senator Sinclair.]

May I ask the Deputy Leader of the Government what the government's plan is for this bill? We are now awaiting a report of the special committee on the subject matter of the bill, and the same order that referred the subject matter to committee also provided that the bill itself be referred to the committee. Will the government be asking the Senate to pass this bill before we have had an opportunity to consider the proceedings before the committee, the report of the committee on the subject matter, and the committee report after second reading? Will it be asking the Senate to hurry this bill and pass it, for example, before the summer recess scheduled for June 30?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, it will come as no surprise to the honourable senator to hear that the government is indeed very anxious to have this bill passed this session. It would be most pleased if the Senate dealt with it before the end of the session. If it takes longer to deal with it, then we will have to face that situation when we come to it. As of this moment it is the desire of the government, as it has made abundantly clear to everyone who is interested, that they want to have the bill attended to before the adjournment.

With regard to the committee work, it is my understanding that the hearings of the special committee have concluded, and that the members of the committee are currently working on a report on the subject matter. I expect that report to be brought to us very soon. I understand it will be within the next day or so. The sponsor of the bill is prepared to speak to second reading at that time, be it tomorrow or whenever. The disposition of the bill, following second reading debate, will then, of course, be entirely in the hands of honourable senators. If the Senate wishes it to go back to the committee again for further study, then so be it, and we will be prepared to take as much time into the summer as is necessary to deal with the bill.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, am I right that the House of Commons has made permanent the rules it has been examining so that it will be adjourning automatically on June 30?

Senator Doody: I understand they have done something along that line. I am not entirely clear on what the House of Commons has done or intends to do. I know pretty well in my own mind what the Senate is doing and hopes to do, and that concerns me more than what is going on in the House of Commons. We have undertaken to deal with Bill C-22 as promptly, efficiently and effectively as we can. I think we are bound to do that, as it is our responsibility. What the House of Commons rules are and how they pertain to our responsibility, of course, is another matter, and I am not going to comment on it.

Order stands.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

MOTION TO REFER INQUIRY ON REPORT ON FILM ENTITLED:
"THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS" TO SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marshall calling the attention of the Senate to the motion adopted by the Senate on May 28, 1986, and passed by a vote of 28 for and 17 against, that the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology entitled: Production and Distribution of the National Film Board Production "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", tabled in the Senate on 15th April, 1986, be referred back to the Committee with instructions to consider and report upon the following:

Strike out page 20 and substitute

RECOMMENDATIONS

1. That after the titles of the film, the following disclaimer be added: "This film is a docu-drama and combines elements of both reality and fiction. It does not pretend to be an even-handed or chronological biography of Billy Bishop.

Although a Walter Bourne did serve as Bishop's mechanic, the film director has used this character to express his own doubts and reservations about Bishop's exploits. There is no evidence that these were shared by the real Walter Bourne."

2. That the National Film Board be requested to take action to eliminate from the film the unproven allegations, charges and innuendoes against the integrity of Billy Bishop; and further, that consideration be given to the apparent disregard by National Film Board officials to their commitments to the Senate Sub-committee on Veterans Affairs arising out of evidence before the Sub-committee.

And on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Le Moyne, that the inquiry be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology for study and report.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Hon. William J. Petten: Honourable senators, I moved the adjournment of this debate in case other honourable senators wished to take part in it. It is not my intention to take part in the debate now, so if any other honourable senator wishes to speak, I ask that he or she feel free to do so.

Order stands.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE—MOTION TO TELEVIEW PROCEEDINGS—DEBATE
CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rousseau:

That pool television cameras be permitted in the Senate Chamber for the purpose of recording the proceedings of a Committee of the Whole with respect to its hearings on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to; and

That the proceedings be televised pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I ask of Senator Flynn leave to deal with what is, in effect, a leftover from the last debate on this order. After I introduced the motion, Senator Phillips asked that we find out what the ground rules are in the House of Commons for televising their proceedings. His question arose because I stated that the proposal was not to have an electronic Hansard but simply to make our proceedings on the Committee of the Whole available to the media, subject to the ground rules obtaining in the House of Commons. Senator Phillips quite reasonably asked what those ground rules are. I undertook to provide some information. I would like to tell you of the information I have. I received it about an hour and a half ago, and I have been unable to reproduce it in time. Also, I am not sure that the Senate would want all of it.

I would like to read a memorandum I asked Mr. Gord Lovelace to prepare. Mr. Lovelace is the Information Officer of the Senate and its contact with the press. The memorandum is addressed to me, and it reads as follows:

There is nothing specific written down regarding guidelines for TV coverage of Commons sittings.

The original motion of years ago made reference to the planned TV coverage being as close as possible to an "electronic Hansard."

Interpretation of that intent has always been left in the hands of the Commons Speaker, who subsequently provides appropriate direction to employees in the Broadcasting Branch.

The understanding of the media, however—in dealings with the Senate on the increasing number of occasions which have seen cameras admitted to our committees—has been as follows:

—Stationary cameras must be in place before a meeting begins and not be removed until after it is over.

—Cameras should focus on the person speaking.

—In the case of the Senate Chamber, camera crews shall wear coat and jacket or other appropriate dress.

The main control on the media in such situations is their very real understanding that, if there are complaints about their professional conduct under the circumstances, they might not be invited back.

● (1450)

Honourable senators, that is the end of that memorandum. However, I also have an extract from the House of Commons Votes and Proceedings dated January 25, 1977, and November 23, 1977, remembering that most of these conditions apply to the electronic Hansard.

I also have an extract from an article by a former Clerk of the House of Commons, Alistair Fraser, entitled: "Televising the Canadian House of Commons". On page 67 of that article, he outlines some of the principles enunciated following those proceedings.

Honourable senators, I do not know whether we want all of this material appended, but I am certainly prepared to have photocopies of it made for everyone before we proceed with the debate. Senator Flynn may have some things to say, even apart from that, and then adjourn the debate until I have made that material available. I am quite happy to suggest that the material be appended, but perhaps the better way is for me to have enough copies made for all senators and have those copies distributed to their offices. Thereafter, we can proceed with the debate, either continuing with Senator Flynn or having Senator Flynn start, having adjourned the debate today. I leave that up to him.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not intend to say everything I have to say about this motion today. In fact, I will move the adjournment of this debate because I would like some additional information. Meanwhile, perhaps I may make a few comments on the principle involved in this motion.

For some time the Senate has been considering whether it would be appropriate to televise its proceedings. It has yet to reach a decision on this question.

Senator Frith's proposal would mean that on this particular occasion and, I suppose, on an experimental basis, the debates of the Senate will be televised. I don't really like the idea that this particular way is being used to further the cause of TV coverage of our proceedings. If the Senate agrees to have its proceedings televised, let it say so clearly and frankly and make the necessary arrangements.

The proposal concerns the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord. I suppose that is not quite the same thing as the Senate, but to all intents and purposes, it means televising the proceedings of the Senate. That is my first concern about this motion.

My second is that Senator Frith tells us this will not cost a penny. I am quite prepared to accept his opinion, but it seems to me we should know more about it and that the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration should look into the matter and see whether no cost is involved. Again, even if it is just an experiment, I think that if the experiment should prove to be a very costly one, senators would be inclined to take a more cautious approach.

My third concern is that I wonder why we do not let the Committee of the Whole or at least its steering committee make the necessary arrangements for the proposed study and recommend TV coverage of these proceedings. It seems to me there is something here that does not fit what should be the logical sequence of events.

If we are talking about following the example of the House of Commons, again, I fail to see how this could not entail significant costs, as well as creating a precedent that would allow TV coverage of the proceedings of the Senate without the Senate itself having actually agreed to the principle.

Honourable senators, I suppose I could adjourn the debate now and see how the sponsor of the motion reacts to the few comments I just made, and perhaps we could resume debate at another time.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

SIXTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the sixth report of the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology (supplementary budget concerning report of Nielsen Task Force—Service to the Public—Veterans), presented in the Senate on June 16, 1987.

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, this is the sixth report of the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. The report has to do with the request for a supplementary budget which would enable the Sub-committee on Veterans Affairs of the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology to continue the proposed study in connection with the document which analyzed government expenditures in a number of sectors, including veterans affairs.

The project went through all regular stages provided for such a request: the sub-committee itself, the Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology, and finally, the Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration which, in turn, gave their authorization.

So to the extent that the regular procedure has been followed, I propose that the report be adopted and the expenditures involved approved.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

On the Order:

Senate in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have discussed this matter with the Leader of the Government in the Senate, and I propose that we resolve ourselves into a Committee of the Whole, that Senator Molgat be chairman, and that we then deal with the election of a steering committee in order to organize the work of the committee. I will not be proposing that we do anything more today, but, of course, I cannot speak for anyone else who may want the committee to do more today. However, I think we have agreed that we want that much done today.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, on a point of order, I believe our rules call for the Chair to name the chairman of the Committee of the Whole, do they not?

Senator Frith: I understand that there has been that practice, but then, with reference to a previous Committee of the Whole, we actually moved the election of Senator Bélisle. Therefore, we have two precedents: One being that the chairman is named, and the other being that the chairman is elected on motion. Therefore, if I have understood Senator Phillips correctly, if we are proposing this to the Speaker, we get the best of both worlds.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I do not believe that precedents should replace our rule book. Our rule book was printed in order that we could more easily follow the rules.

● (1500)

Senator Frith: No, I say this really combines both, without the precedent interfering with the rule.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, there does not seem to be anything in the rule book that I can see that addresses these questions.

Senator Frith: We have used both procedures. In order not to make a choice between the two, I am proposing that Your Honour leave the Chair, that we resolve into Committee of the Whole, and that Your Honour ask Senator Molgat to take the Chair in Committee of the Whole.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Pursuant to the order of your honourable house, I leave the Chair. The Honourable Senator Molgat will please take the Chair of the committee.

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional accord and texts subsequently agreed to, the Honourable Senator Gildas L. Molgat in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, first, I want to thank you for your confidence in appointing me Chairman of this committee. I am not sure that you are doing me a favour in view of the subject with which we are dealing.

In any event, the first step to take is to establish a steering committee.

[English]

Honourable senators, are there any proposals?

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, when this matter was being discussed in the regular sittings, I suggested that the whips nominate the steering committee. I move, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that the steering committee be constituted of the Honourable Senators Murray or Doody, Flynn, Phillips, MacEachen or Frith, Hébert, Molgat, Petten and Stewart.

The Chairman: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that the steering committee be established, composed of the following honourable senators: Senators Murray, Flynn or Doody, Phillips, MacEachen or Frith, Hébert, Molgat, Petten and Stewart.

Senator Doody: It is Murray or Doody, not Flynn or Doody.

The Chairman: Murray or Doody.

Senator Frith: A palace revolt while the leader is out of town!

The Chairman: I am sorry. If I may re-word it: Murray or Doody and Flynn and Phillips. Are there any other nominations? If not, is that agreeable, honourable senators?

Senator Frith: Agreed.

The Chairman: Then that will be the steering committee. Is there any other business before us at this point?

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I hope that the steering committee will be able to meet soon. The reference to the Committee of the Whole is to deal with this material, to hear witnesses, and to report. I hope that we can set up a schedule for witnesses so that we will hear some before we adjourn on the 30th. In that way we can at least get started. My suggestion to the steering committee is that our first witness might well be someone whom the government would like to call to explain some of the detail and answer some questions with regard to some of the constitutional consequences, what might be called the more academic or technical element rather than the political in dealing with this subject. However, that will be a matter for the steering committee. I simply hope that the committee, under your chairmanship, can meet soon so that we can at least start our proceedings before we adjourn on the 30th, and so that we can discuss whether we want to meet during the summer.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, if I heard the Honourable Senator Frith correctly, he said before we adjourn on Thursday.

Senator Frith: No, before the Senate adjourns on the 30th.

Senator Phillips: On Thursday I thought you said.

Senator Frith: No. If I said on Thursday, I did not mean that. I meant to say on the 30th.

[Translation]

Senator Rousseau: Mr. Chairman, are women not part of the Canadian population? Could a woman not have been appointed to this committee?

The Chairman: Are there any more questions? If not, we can have a meeting of the steering committee tomorrow morning.

[English]

Would ten o'clock tomorrow morning be suitable to the members of the steering committee, provided we can find an appropriate room? Perhaps room 263, tomorrow morning at ten? Later this day?

Senator Frith: Shall we invite Senator Rousseau to attend?

Senator Flynn: Certainly.

[Translation]

Senator Rousseau: Mr. Chairman, I did not ask this question to be appointed to this sub-committee myself; there are other women who could be appointed.

The Chairman: Senator Rousseau, there seems to be a consensus in favour of inviting you to sit on the committee. Would we have leave to meet when we adjourn the sitting this afternoon? One moment, I see that Senator Corbin wishes to speak.

Senator Corbin: Is it not a fact that all senators are members of all committees of the Senate and are free to attend any sitting of a sub-committee?

The Chairman: Yes, but without having the right to vote. Is there agreement for the steering committee to meet in Room 263-S after we adjourn the sitting this afternoon? Senator Rousseau, you have a special invitation to attend this meeting. Does everyone agree?

[English]

Senator Spivak: Mr. Chairman, does this mean that Senator Rousseau is not a member of the steering committee?

Senator Flynn: No.

Senator Spivak: Her question, if I understood it, was whether or not there ought to be a woman, at least, as a representative of that half of the population, to be a member of the steering committee. I do not think that that response of inviting Senator Rousseau to attend satisfies her question adequately.

Senator Frith: My suggestion that Senator Rousseau attend was not to have her take her place on the committee, because I agree that that would not adequately answer the question she raised, but, rather, to have the steering committee meet. She could attend—she is entitled to attend in any event—with a view to rectifying the mistake to which she has drawn our attention. We can nominate a senator now if we wish, but this procedure has been done by the two whips. I suggest that they consult in order to solve the problem that has been raised by Senator Rousseau, and that in the meantime she attend meetings of the steering committee.

• (1510)

Senator Spivak: Honourable senators, is it in order to nominate a senator now?

Senator Frith: Certainly.

Senator Spivak: I, therefore, nominate Senator Rousseau to be a member of the steering committee.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, that raises a question as to the distribution of the subcommittee to reflect the division within the Senate. The number is going to make it difficult to maintain a five-and-three relationship. Perhaps there should be some suggestion as to what the membership of the subcommittee will be in the future.

Senator Frith: That is why I suggested the matter be left with the whips for the time being. I hope there will be a solution. I suggested that a more permanent solution be found by the two whips. The whips can speak for themselves, but if I understand Senator Phillips, he wants an opportunity to consider how the problem raised by Senator Rousseau will be solved—that is, that there are no women on the steering committee.

I wanted to leave it with the two whips, but in the meantime to have a woman attend the steering committee today. If that solution is not satisfactory, then let us have a better one.

Senator Petten: Honourable senators, as Senator Frith has said, the whips can speak for themselves, and, speaking on my own behalf, I suggest that Senator Phillips and I sit down and discuss this. I think we can resolve it to everybody's satisfaction.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Spivak, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, that the Honourable Senator Rousseau be added to the list of senators serving on the steering committee.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I should like to respond to Senator Phillips, who has a problem with balance in terms of party representation. I think we ought to go a step further than simply recognizing that there ought to be room for the "token" woman on such a committee. I think we ought to name two women, one representing the government and one representing the official opposition. I think that would satisfy everyone. After all, this is a Committee of the Whole, and there are many members to choose from on the Committee of the Whole. Let us do away with this tokenism and get on with the task at hand.

I suggest that the Honourable Senator Spivak be named to the steering committee.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, it has been moved by the Honourable Senator Spivak, seconded by the Honourable Senator Fairbairn, that the name of Senator Rousseau be added to the list of senators serving on the steering committee.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Carried. We welcome Senator Rousseau to the steering committee.

Are there any further matters?

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, if need be, I move that the Honourable Senator Spivak be added to the list of senators serving on the steering committee of the Committee of the Whole.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Corbin, seconded by the Honourable Senator Simard, that the Honourable Senator Spivak be added to the list of senators serving on the steering committee.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Carried.

Are there any other matters before the committee?

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again.

The Chairman: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Petten, that the committee rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

[Translation]

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole to which the Meech Lake Accord and texts subsequently agreed to was referred reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this Committee have leave to sit again?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again at the next sitting of the Senate.

VISIT OF SENATE DELEGATION TO JAPAN

DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon Guy Charbonneau rose, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, June 9, 1987:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the visit of a Senate delegation to Japan, from April 13 to 19, 1987, in response to an invitation from the Japanese House of Councillors.

He said: Honourable senators, a delegation from the Senate visited Japan in April 1987 as the guests of the House of Councillors, the Upper House of Japan's Parliament.

The delegation was composed of the following persons: Myself, as Speaker of this chamber and leader of the delegation; the Honourable Orville H. Phillips, Government Whip; the Honourable Ernest G. Cottreau; the Honourable Royce Frith, Deputy Leader of the Opposition in the Senate; the Honourable Yvette B. Rousseau; Mrs. Toshiko Adilman, our interpreter; and Ms. Kay Higgins, Executive Assistant to the Speaker.

The visit was in response to an invitation received from Mr. Masaaki Fujita, the current President of the House of Councillors, following the visit to Canada in 1985 of a House of Councillors delegation led by the then President Mutsuo Kimura.

The delegates arrived in Tokyo on Sunday, April 12, and the official program began on April 13. It should be noted that the delegation's visit took place at a time when trade relations between Japan and the United States were subject to considerable friction arising from the positions taken by the two countries with regard to Japanese exports of semi-conductors. In fact, it was during our visit that the President of the United States announced an embargo against the import into the United States of certain Japanese products as a result of this unresolved problem. These difficulties with the United States inevitably formed one of the themes of discussion during the meetings held over the next several days, together with the high value of the Japanese yen which was dominating the money markets and economic trade relations in general.

A subject of great interest also to our Japanese counterparts, and to the businessmen and financial market people with whom the delegation met, was the free trade negotiations being carried on between the Canadian and United States governments.

Other themes which emerged will be apparent from this report, but the overriding one was the often expressed interest of our hosts in increasing exchanges at the political and parliamentary levels.

[Translation]

On May 13, following a very instructive briefing for the delegation at the Canadian Ambassador's residence, by our Ambassador, Mr. Barry Steers, and members of the embassy staff, the delegation was received at luncheon by the Japan-Canada Parliamentarians Friendship League. The League was represented by its President, Mr. Toshio Komoto, an important member of the House of Representatives and President of the League since 1983, and several members of the League drawn from different political parties. In responding to the President's welcoming address, the delegation expressed its pleasure that its first official meeting of the visit should be hosted by the Friendship League. The activities of the Canada-Japan Parliamentary Association were referred to; and we took the occasion, when referring to Canada's intensified relationship with Japan, to mention matters of particular interest to Canada and to the delegation in the context of its visit, that is: Canada's desire to see an expansion of our two-way trade—with greater access for Canadian products to Japanese markets and more direct investment in Canada by Japanese industry. In the conversation which followed, these matters and the current difficulties in the trade relations between Japan and the U.S.A. were touched on, in a frank and friendly atmosphere, aided by the graciousness of our hosts and the setting, which was a famous Japanese-style restaurant well known for its charm and hospitality, the Fukudaya.

Courtesy calls were then paid on the President of the House of Councillors, His Excellency Mr. Masaaki Fujita, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, His Excellency Mr. Kenzaburo Hara.

Present at the meeting with Mr. Fujita, our official host, were His Excellency Mr. Hideyuki Seya, Vice-President of the House of Councillors, and the Chairman and members of the Committee on Rules and Administration. After his words of welcome, Mr. Fujita discussed the close and varied relations between Canada and Japan, which could be traced, he said, to "bridges" started by missionaries, early businessmen and immigrants to Canada. He noted that relations between Canada and Japan and between their parliamentarians were intensifying. We referred to the importance the Canadian government attached to Japan in its statement of priorities at the opening of Parliament. We also expressed appreciation for the welcome given to the delegation of the Canada-Japan Parliamentary Association when it had visited Japan in March 1987 and said we looked forward to increased exchanges in many spheres. People-to-people exchanges diversified relations and made us better world citizens. There followed a brief exchange about the current Japan-U.S. trade friction and Mr. Nakasone's forthcoming visit to Washington. Questions were asked about the Canada-U.S. free trade negotiations and the effects such an agreement would have on Canada-Japan Trade. I expressed my feeling that it would have a positive effect. There was an enquiry regarding President Reagan's visit to Ottawa, and the main items on the agenda at that time. Mr. Fujita said that Japan would like close talks with the U.S.A. He also expressed the hope that Japan's international promise to stimulate the domestic economy would lead to the construction of larger houses, using more Canadian lumber. Mr. Fujita also referred to the 1985 visit to the Canadian Senate of a delegation from the House of Councillors—he said they had been very well and kindly received.

The next call was on His Excellency Mr. Kenzaburo Hara, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who received the delegation at the Diet Building, accompanied by the Vice-President, His Excellency Mr. Shinnen Tagaya, and the chairman and members of the Committee on the Rules and Administration of the House of Representatives. After welcoming the delegation, Mr. Hara referred to the visit to Japan by Prime Minister Mulroney last year, and commented with satisfaction on the growing number of parliamentary exchange visits. He said he would like to see even more exchanges of persons, more relations between universities, more twinning of cities. Parliamentary visits, he agreed, were already increasing; the March visit of the Canada-Japan Parliamentary Association delegation had been very important and impressive in what it had accomplished.

Deputy Speaker Tagaya observed that Canada had a trade deficit with Japan now; he asked in what product areas Canada hoped to expand sales to Japan. The opportunity was taken to request removal of the restrictions on the import of 2 by 4 lumber from Canada and on the construction of 3-storey horizontally-separated buildings. It was suggested that this would help Japan to meet its considerable housing needs. Confidence was expressed on the Japanese side that restrictions on 3-storey buildings would eventually be eased as part of the government's liberalization policy.

[English]

Questions were asked about the present situation of oil-sand exploitation in Canada. Our response was that this depended largely on an increase in the price of oil. Japan, of course, has lots of technology for this kind of oil refining, and, in fact, the Saskatchewan government was having discussions on this with the Japanese. Ambassador Steers pointed out that Canadian resources were a source of secure supply for Japan. Mr. Hara inquired about the timetable for the free trade negotiations and was told that currently it was expected to have an agreement by October 5, 1987.

● (1530)

The delegation was honoured to be received by the Prime Minister, His Excellency Mr. Yasuhiro Nakasone, at his office. He welcomed the delegation and expressed appreciation for the opportunity to address both houses of the Canadian Parliament in January 1986.

He stressed the importance he attached to the senators' visit, saying that Parliament-Diet relations were important, and, in the interest of Japan and Canada, they should be deepened, enriched and expanded. As leader of the delegation, I thanked the Prime Minister for taking time to receive the delegation at a very busy and crucial period for him, as there had been a slight setback for him in local elections on the previous day.

There was a brief discussion of the Kanao Economic Mission to Canada in the fall of 1986, and the Japanese interest in our free trade negotiations. The Prime Minister commented that Japan's interests were essentially that the outcome should not harm third-party countries, and should be consistent with GATT. The Prime Minister, in answer to a question, explained his position regarding the issue of a value added tax, which he felt would loosen up the distribution system, thereby increasing imports to the Japanese domestic market.

Later in the day Mr. and Mrs. Fujita gave a reception in honour of the delegation at the President's residence. It was a very lively and pleasant occasion, during which various Japanese delicacies could be tasted to the sound of Koto music, and toasts to Canadian-Japanese friendship were offered on each side. The delegation had the opportunity of meeting there many more members of the House of Councillors and the House of Representatives, including such members of the House of Councillors as the former President, Mr. Mutsuo Kimura, Mr. Atsushi Akiyama and Mr. Tomoyuki Fukuma, all of whom had visited Canada as the guests of Parliament.

On April 15 the delegation had a meeting with the House of Councillors' Committee for Commerce and Industry, presided over by the chairman, Mr. Isao Maeda. Four directors and three members of the committee were present.

The chairman referred to the cordial relations and increasing number of exchanges between Canada and Japan, and to their relations as good neighbours and reliable trading partners. He stressed the contribution that exchanges of opinion between parliamentarians can make to strengthening relations. He welcomed the opportunity for a frank exchange of views. We pointed out that protectionism was a problem faced by both countries, and reiterated that Canada was committed to its trade partnership with Japan, and, except for a few irritants, it could be said that Canada was the least complaining of Japan's partners. The delegation was here today to discuss ways of achieving even closer ties as far as legislative and trade and financial aspects were concerned.

Senator Frith commented that the businessmen often seemed to be ahead of the politicians in exploring ways in which our mutually advantageous relationship could benefit us even more. Our political relations should be deepened in the same way our trade relations have been. Politicians, of course, know Parliament and its processes. Perhaps meetings between our respective committees—for example, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce with the analogous committee of the House of Councillors—could be considered. The chairman agreed that there was room to develop further exchanges at the political level and undertook to consider the suggestion.

Mr. Toyotomi Fukuma contrasted Canada-Japan economic relations, which were generally harmonious, with those between Japan and the United States, where there were currently serious frictions. He expressed hope for more Canada-Japan cooperation in science and technology. In response to our suggestion that a free trade agreement would make Canada more attractive to the Japanese direct investor, who could thereby supply U.S. markets with products manufactured in Canada, Mr. Fukuma felt that although this might help to reduce the imbalance in Japan-U.S. trade, he noted that possible frictions with the United States could occur.

The Canadian delegation confirmed Canada's commitment to maintaining its special trading relationship with Japan in the event of a free trade agreement becoming a reality.

On matters of present concern to Canada, such as small irritants in our relationship, and Canada's desire to see guarantees of security of demand in response to security of supply, there was the matter of the tariff on Canadian SPF lumber. We mentioned that U.S. hemlock was imported into Japan without tariff. This was something, we thought, that could probably be looked at in the context of security of supply between Canada and Japan. Mr. Fukuma pointed out that Japan's tariffs were not the highest among the industrialized countries, and that in processed timber and pressed wood Canada was Japan's largest supplier, supplying 70 per cent of processed timber. Other Canadian imports such as copper, oil seeds, and so on, made Canada one of Japan's major sources of imports. Canada could never be replaced as a country from which Japan imported many things, but Canada is competing in many areas with other countries such as the U.S.A. and Australia.

He mentioned, with regard to Japanese direct investment in Canada, that the figure had increased greatly in the last few years, but direct investment in industry had important effects on the domestic economy; for example, unemployment, which had to be measured and set against other advantages to be gained.

In closing the discussion, Chairman Maeda commented that the politicians should not be letting the industrialists move ahead of them in promoting closer working relationships. He would report to the President that he and his colleagues had had very meaningful exchanges with their Canadian colleagues. As parliamentarians, we had an interest in removing any small irritants that exist. At the same time, he would like to solve the larger problems. He hoped that regular contacts between the parliamentarians of both countries would be realized and the dialogue continued.

Other important meetings took place on April 15. The delegation was received at a luncheon by the Chairman of the Japan-Canada Committee of the Keidanren, the Federation of Economic Organizations, Mr. Minoru Kanao. The luncheon was held at Keidanren House and attended by a large number of leading Japanese businessmen, members of the Keidanren.

In October 1986 Mr. Kanao, Chairman of Nippon Kokkan K.K., had led a high-level economic mission to Canada, under the auspices of the Japanese government. The findings of the mission, as set out in its report, "Discovery of a New Canada", were very positive. As to the strength of the economy, the education and skill of our workforce, labour-management relations, the world-class level of our high technology industries, and the cooperation between various levels of government, all combined to make Canada a fertile place for Japanese investment. This report was of great significance to Canada, as it put to rest a range of concerns about Canada in the minds of many Japanese.

The delegation took the opportunity to express Canada's appreciation of the personal commitment of Mr. Kanao and his colleagues to improving Canada-Japan relations. Mr. Kanao confirmed that he would be going to Vancouver in May to attend the 10th meeting of the Joint Committee on Canada-Japan Business Cooperation, which was growing year by year. He said that our relations were now facing a new phase. With the sharp appreciation of the yen, Japan was looking at Canada to make investments. With the depressed commodity and resources prices, Canada was now putting greater emphasis on technology. There was a shift to mutual cooperation in industrial development and towards technological exchanges. He welcomed the opportunity to have a frank exchange of views.

The delegation referred to the Canada-U.S. trade negotiations aimed at securing market access, and to the opportunity for Japanese firms to produce in Canada and market in the U.S.A. In this context the significance of the findings of the Kanao report should not be overlooked.

Among the questions raised by the Keidanren members was one concerning the free trade negotiations and the Liberal Party's attitude towards them. Senator Frith replied that comments on a specific text would have to await the full text of an agreement, but, in principle, if the agreement was in the interest of Canada, as could be expected, the Liberal Party—traditionally a free-trade party—would not impede it.

The delegates were impressed by the lively interest shown by the Keidanren members present, and by its slogan: "Please keep your door open—we are keeping ours open," as it appears on a small wooden wedge presented to each delegate before the end of the luncheon.

[Translation]

In the late afternoon, there was an opportunity for the delegates to meet members of the Tokyo-based Canada-Japan Chamber of Commerce, composed of Canadian businessmen carrying on business in Japan. The meeting was held at the Canadian ambassador's residence. The delegates were interested in knowing what role they could play as parliamentarians in facilitating and promoting the closer ties which are being formed between Canadian and Japanese governments and businesses. In response, the Canadian businessmen laid emphasis on the need for preparing more specialists in Japan in Canadian business schools, more Japanese language training on a broad scale, more efforts to enable young Canadians to have access to working in Japanese businesses for a year or two, more education of the public in the importance to Canada of Japan—this was very neglected at present; there was a need for a high degree of consciousness-raising, including much more Canadian media (especially TV) coverage of Japanese affairs and our relationship with Japan. For example, the CBC did not have even one correspondent or representative stationed in Japan. Businessmen should be targetted particularly; the opportunities in Japan were vast, but they must be prepared to make time and efforts to study the market. Parliamentarians wishing to support these efforts at consciousness-raising could obtain material through the Canadian Embassy or through the Canada-Japan Chamber of Commerce in Tokyo.

[English]

The delegation also had a meeting at Nomura Securities, the largest investment and securities brokerage firm in the world, which, incidentally, has recently acquired a seat on the Toronto Stock Exchange. There was a general discussion with Mr. Yoshio Terasawa, Executive Vice-President, and his colleagues about inducements that the appreciation of the yen and the Canada-U.S.A. free trade talks provided for Japanese direct investment in Canada, and about the prospects for an opening of the Japanese financial market to foreign investment dealers and brokers. This was followed by briefings on the Japanese economy and on direct Japanese investment in Canada by Mr. Hirohiko Okamura, Chief Economist of Nomura Research Institute, and included a discussion of the dramatic increase in Japanese capital formation and the possibilities of recycling this capital to help development in all parts of the world, as was done by the United States in the forties and fifties.

[Translation]

On Thursday, April 16, the delegation left Tokyo, taking the Shinkansen Hikari train to Osaka, where they were met by the Canadian Consul General, Mr. Michael C. Spencer and Mrs. Spencer. Mr. Spencer briefed the delegation on the activities of the Osaka Consulate General since its opening by Minister Pat Carney in November 1986. Senators will know that Osaka is the nation's original commercial hub and the Kansai region is Japan's second largest industrial, commercial, financial and population centre. All these factors combine to keep the Consulate General extremely busy.

The delegation was warmly received by the President of the Matsushita Electric Trading Co. Ltd., Mr. Kiyoshi Seki, at its Kadoma plant, and toured the video recorder division's facilities. The fine precision-machining involved in the process requires the use of robots, including inspection robots to check the work. Matsushita's product lines include Panasonic, National and Quasar. Here the delegation was happy to be joined by Mr. Fukuma, a member of the House of Councilors' Committee on Commerce and Industry.

The evening concluded with a performance of Bunraku, the traditional puppet-theatre, for which Osaka is famous.

[English]

Before leaving Tokyo for a three-day visit to the Kansai area, the delegates visited the Abiko plant of NEC, where they saw a new generation office automation plant featuring NEC's "Computers and Communications" technology and various types of voice and data communications systems.

The Canadian ambassador hosted a reception in the delegation's honour on April 15, at which the guests included members of the Diet, the Canadian community in Tokyo, visiting representatives of the Saskatchewan government, members of the embassy staff and others.

The next two days were devoted to seeing the ancient capitals of Nara and Kyoto, with visits to some of the many famous and beautiful shrines, temples, gardens and parks, including a fascinating visit to Nijo Castle dating from the early Tokugawa era. The weather was very good, the cherry blossoms were still in full bloom, and it was very pleasant to sit and be entertained by the music of the Koto and a flower arrangement demonstration, and to participate in the traditional tea ceremony.

If I may interject a personal note here—no pun intended—I would add that our colleague, Senator Frith, did us proud by giving a very creditable performance on the Koto. But this will not surprise honourable senators, who have seen him playing upon our heart-strings in this august chamber!

[Translation]

The delegation returned to Tokyo on April 18th and the delegates departed Japan on April 19th.

Our hosts, the House of Councillors, organized for the delegation a high-level program, and it would be hard to exaggerate the degree of attention paid to the delegation in terms of the meetings arranged for us and the care devoted to our comfort and well-being. We were accompanied throughout the visit by Mr. Ken Ikebe, the Director-General of the Foreign Relations Department of the House of Councillors, and he and his excellent team of staffers were unfailing in their competence, courtesy and good humour.

Ambassador Steers and his staff were invaluable in offering us their guidance and help, and we are very grateful to them.

Mrs. Toshiko Adilman, our interpreter, was a very valuable member of our group, and Miss Kay Higgins acted as the secretary to the delegation.

Senators Phillips, Côtteau and I were accompanied by our spouses, and Senator Rousseau by her daughter, Miss Jeanne-Mance Rousseau. Special activities were arranged for the spouses by our hosts during the Tokyo program.

[English]

Honourable senators, I think you will understand from the foregoing that our visit achieved our main objectives—to meet with and get to know our Japanese colleagues and their institutions; to hear their views and give them ours on matters touching the relations between our two countries; to reiterate Canada's commitment to its important trade partnership with Japan; to explore ways in which we as legislators can help to expand our cooperation in a number of areas, and to confirm what the findings of the Kanao report have made clear: that Canada offers attractive possibilities for direct investment by Japanese industry.

None of this would have been possible without the kind welcome, cooperation and sympathetic hearings we received throughout our visit, and we have, of course, expressed our pleasure and gratitude to our hosts, the House of Councillors of Japan.

Finally, I would like to take this occasion personally to express my most sincere thanks to all the members of the delegation and the accompanying staff for their invaluable contributions to the success of our visit.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

THE PHILIPPINES

CURRENT SITUATION

Hon. B. Alasdair Graham rose, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, June 17, 1987:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the situation in the Philippines.

He said: Honourable senators, last month I had the privilege to lead an international observer delegation to the congressional elections in the Philippines. I was also present before, during and after the presidential, or so-called "snap", election of February 7, 1986.

Much has happened in the intervening period. Because the official canvass, or counting of ballots, for the last election is almost complete, I thought it might be timely and useful to share with honourable senators some observations with respect to events in that part of the world.

The country itself is comprised of 13 regions, 74 provinces, over 7,000 islands, and a population estimated at 57 million, of whom over 26 million were registered to vote in the congressional election.

The presidential election of 1986 was referred to as the "snap" election because Ferdinand Marcos still had one year to go in his mandate. It was believed that he called the election early because he felt he could catch a growing and much strengthened opposition off guard.

The 1986 observer team was assembled by both the Democratic and Republican National Institutes for International Affairs based in Washington, D.C. We were 44 people from 19 countries. The delegation witnessed and reported widespread voting irregularities, fraud, intimidation and deliberate manipulation of the official count in order to favour former President Marcos. It was our conclusion that despite extensive interference by Marcos forces, had there been a fair count, Corazon Aquino would have received a significant majority of the ballots cast.

The observer delegation played an important role in alerting the world and setting the record straight as to the true state of affairs in the Philippines at that time. But I want to emphasize that it was the Philippine people themselves who determined their own fate through the greatest example of peaceful people power in modern history. For them it was a case of "now or never." Enough was enough. Manila became a Parliament of the streets. There was a well organized campaign of economic and political resistance. Officials and diplomats defected. Soldiers mutinied and, in turn, were protected by the people. The stories are endless, and the lessons should never be forgotten. They should be taught over and over, but not just to Filipinos. The dramatic collapse of the Marcos regime has important lessons for the world. There are effective alternatives to violent revolution. The struggle for democracy, for free and fair elections, should never cease, and those of us in the comfortable pew can play a role.

● (1550)

Events which followed the revolution, including overwhelming support for a new constitution in February of this year, are further evidence that Filipinos are on the right path, and that the world can learn much from their progress and achievements.

It was against that background that the Democratic Institute for International Affairs organized another observer delegation for the congressional election on May 11.

I should say a brief word about the institute, which is chaired by former Vice President Walter Mondale. When we talk about lessons to be taught and learned, the work of NDI stands out as a first class example of how non-partisan political development programs can be conducted where they are most needed around the world. NDI seeks to strengthen democratic institutions and pluralistic values in new and emerging democracies.

In the last three years the institute has conducted successful programs in over 30 countries. Its terms of reference are worthy of very close study and examination by Canadians, with a view to establishing our own programs in order to pursue and, indeed, share to a much greater extent in the promotion of freedom and democracy.

Last year's events, and President Aquino's efforts to consolidate the Philippine democracy, have provided an important base of information and an incentive to advocates of democracy in many corners of the globe.

The major goal of this year's mission was to learn from the successful Philippine experience. The delegation was comprised of political parties, labour, business and religious leaders. We were 24 people from 11 different countries, including Panama, Paraguay, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Taiwan, South Korea, Chile, Haiti, Northern Ireland, the United States and, of course, myself from Canada. We were invited, as we had been before, by Comelec, the Philippine Commission on Elections, with the approval of Namfrel, the National Citizens Movement for Free Elections.

In organizing the new mission, NDI invited influential supporters of democratic reform from countries seeking to promote or strengthen the electoral process at home. I am convinced that the mission achieved its purpose. It is a tribute to NDI President Brian Attwood, Executive Vice President Ken Wollack and those others responsible for organization—to those who participated and the countless people in the Philippines who opened their minds and their hearts to members of the mission. Worthy of special mention is Canada's distinguished Ambassador to the Philippines, His Excellency Russell Davidson, who played a key role in the success of our program.

We had the benefit of extensive briefings from Comelec, Namfrel, government officials, political party leaders and individual citizens. It was an interesting mix of people, with the right chemistry, and with one common objective, namely, to learn by observing.

One of the most interesting parts of the entire program was a forum on our final day, when delegation members reflected on the relevance of their observations to the situation in their respective countries. Without exception, they stressed the value of lessons learned, and individually they spoke positively of how those lessons could be put to practical use in their own countries.

As to the election itself, the difference between 1986 and 1987 was like night and day. The changes and improvements reflect enormous credit on Comelec, Namfrel and, in general, the new system of government under President Aquino. Let me give you an example. Because I was one of the few returnees from the 1986 observer delegation, I thought it would be useful to visit again some of the areas which I had observed a year earlier. So, I went back to Mindanao and into coastal and mountain towns and villages.

In 1986 you could sense and feel the tension from the moment we arrived. This time the people were more relaxed, although there was visible evidence of deep concern and precautionary measures against irregularities and violence. Indeed, in some areas of the region many lives were lost.

But to illustrate the change, I recall visiting one village in the mountains very early in the morning on election day last year—a place called Pagalungan. I was told the night before that there would be two voting precincts located there, and that it was worth a visit because there might be some differences of opinion with respect to the voting process. But the village was empty. It had been evacuated on short notice. In fact, not a single vote was cast at those precincts. But I read later that the silent village voted for Marcos. This year when I revisited, about the same time of day, I met 200 happy, smiling, friendly, courteous residents exercising their democratic rights in a festive, holiday mood.

The same could be said about the neighbouring village of Tagpangi, where a year ago we were intimidated and asked to leave in no uncertain terms. Tagpangi, too, voted overwhelmingly for Marcos in 1986, and we were told later by canvassing observers that most of the ballots were signed by the same hand.

There were countless similar situations, but I relate those two merely to illustrate the very significant changes that have taken place in one year.

[Senator Graham.]

On May 11 of this year Filipinos felt, for the first time in at least 20 years, that the ballot they marked would be counted, and, indeed, for those who felt intimidated before, they could now vote according to their conscience. To substantiate this point, it is worth noting that of those eligible to vote the turnout was 76 per cent in 1986 and almost 90 per cent in 1987.

While we were in the Philippines, members of opposition parties, particularly the Grand Alliance for Democracy headed by Juan Ponce Enrile, and the residue of the Marcos KBL complained that there were numerous fraudulent electoral practices. This was perhaps to be expected, given the weak showing of opposition members in the election. I want to emphasize that I can only report what we observed. We did not observe any irregularities that would have any effect on the outcome of the election. Of that group to which I have just referred it appears that only Enrile and Joseph Estrada have been elected to the Senate; and it appeared at the time that we were in the Philippines that Enrile would not be successful.

On the other hand, the Communists have not been idle. While attempts at negotiated peace failed, very recently a telling blow was dealt to the insurgency. More than 1,200 rebels surrendered. This represents a sizeable percentage of the total strength of the New People's Army.

While the NPA is becoming less influential than it was before, it is unbearably oppressive in a number of areas where it holds sway. There has been a reaction to this in the formation—apparently spontaneous—of citizen groups and vigilantes, especially on the Island of Mindanao, who have driven the NPA out of some of their strongholds. This is an interesting development which contains an inherent danger. Should these groups become uncontrolled in these actions, and indeed uncontrollable, they could represent almost as much of a threat to the government's efforts to maintain law and order as the NPA. In addition, there remains a hard core of avowed Marxists who are attempting to maintain the NPA, at least in the public eye, by embarking on a number of activities, such as the "Sparrow" unit groups in Manila who are targeting the police and military.

● (1600)

Another source of destabilization which is not ideologically oriented is the problem of the cultural minorities, principally emanating from the Cordilleras of Northern Luzon and Muslim provinces in the south. President Aquino has shown her good faith in dealing with this problem, and the new Constitution recognizes that the culture of these areas is disparate from the rest of the Philippines. Article X, section 15, of the Philippine Constitution provides:

There shall be created autonomous regions in Muslim Mindanao and in the Cordilleras consisting of provinces, cities, municipalities, and geographical areas sharing common and distinctive historical and cultural heritage, economic and social structures, and other relevant characteristics within the framework of this Constitution and the national sovereignty as well as territorial integrity of the Republic of the Philippines.

Honourable senators, I interpret that to mean autonomy, but not dismemberment.

On land reform the government is striving to formulate and implement a genuine and feasible land reform program based on social justice and fairness. I understand that President Aquino is committed to issuing the necessary executive order to implement land reform before congress convenes in July. The Philippines has been negotiating with international financial institutions to obtain the money so that the program can be a successful reality. There is a considerable degree of impatience on the part of rural dwellers with regard to land reform, and it is important that substantive action be taken soon.

The Aquino government inherited a ravaged and debt-ridden economy from the previous administration and is attempting to address economic problems squarely, avoiding cosmetic and half-hearted efforts of the past, which often sacrificed lasting solutions to short-sighted gains. In view of this, the Philippine economy manifested a growth of 1.5 per cent in its gross national product in 1986, after two years of decline. For the first quarter of 1987, the reported GNP growth was 5.53 per cent. Agricultural production grew at 3.74 per cent for the whole of 1986, making good the government's claim that food production is the linchpin of the economic recovery program. Industrial production posted a 3.2 per cent increase in the fourth quarter of 1986, after declining more than 20 per cent over the last two years.

The economic progress evident in the first quarter of 1987 could be attributed to several factors, including a show of confidence in the government, particularly by the private sector. This progress was demonstrated in terms of expanded domestic demand, lower cost of money, a stable peso, and manageable prices for domestic products. The economic score-sheet showed the industry sector as the largest source of growth, with a 9.86 per cent expansion in real terms. The agricultural sector grew at a slower pace of 1.81 per cent in real terms. This was attributed to the drought that resulted in decreased production of corn, coconut, sugar-cane and all other major products of that nature. In the service sector real income from trading activities recorded the highest growth of 9.15 per cent during the first three months of the year.

While the economic growth is very encouraging, it might be difficult to sustain, unless there is greater foreign business investment as well as large scale domestic investment. Continued political stability and a safe business environment remain essential pre-conditions for such investment. And there remains the sad but factual statistic about the 70 per cent of Filipinos living in poverty.

The Government of Canada has already committed $100 million over five years to a full range development assistance program. Filipinos are deeply appreciative of that help. Trade Minister Jose Concepcion told me last month in Manila that future economic growth in his country would have to rely on trade, not aid. So their long-term plans and objectives are again pointing in the right direction.

Filipinos have one more electoral hurdle to face in the near future. The local elections for governors and mayors have been postponed from August to November. Interest will be intense because of the more localized personalities and problems. The battle for supremacy in provinces, cities and towns will attract well over 20,000 candidates, and, again, an unusual amount of attention from the world.

I had the privilege of meeting President Aquino on my final day in Manila. This remarkable lady continues to inspire the world with her quiet strength, undeniable courage, unwavering dedication, straightforward honesty, uncanny instincts and everyday common sense. Honourable senators, history will record that she is indeed the right person in the right place at the right time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

PRESCRIPTION DRUG PRICES

EFFECT OF PROPOSED PATENT ACT AMENDMENT— PRESENTATION OF PETITIONS

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have the honour to present the following petition:

TO THE HONOURABLE THE SENATE OF CANADA, IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED

The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your Petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable Senate will therefore provide a remedy,

HUMBLY SHEWETH

WHEREAS, the proposed changes to the Patent Act will affect directly all Canadians who are not protected by private or governmental medicare programs, and

WHEREAS the federal government's proposals will raise the cost, already high, of the provincial health care programs, and

WHEREAS the monopoly granted to innovative pharmaceutical companies will prevent competition from generic companies and will result in an increase of drug cost and prices and will severely restrict the ability of average Canadians to buy necessary prescription drugs, and

WHEREAS the proposed changes to the Patent Act are another example of the Canadian government's concession to the Free Trade negotiations with the United States, at the expense of everyday Canadians.

WHEREFORE, the undersigned, your Petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to reject these proposals which will increase prescription drug prices for Canadians.

And as in duty bound your Petitioners will ever pray.

Honourable senators, these petitions contain over 370 names of Albertans from Calgary, Edmonton, Red Deer, Jasper, Hinton, Blackfolds, Leduc, Devon, Sherwood Park, Sylvan Lake, Cochrane, Olds, Sundre and Bowden. I shall not read all the names, but I request that they be recorded in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and appended to the Debates of the Senate at a later date, depending on the printing schedule of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have four petitions which are basically in the same terms as those read by the honourable Senator Fairbairn, except that they are from other provinces. I suggest that we follow the same procedure, that is, that they not be printed today but, rather, that they be printed as an appendix at a later date so that the Printing Bureau may take its time in printing them, thereby not holding up the printing of today's Hansard.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. It seems to me that two or three weeks ago the Leader of the Government made the point, to which the Senate agreed, with regard to petitions that they would not be dealt with in this way. During that discussion I introduced a motion covering the suggestion that had been discussed. I thought that the Senate had agreed that from that point on we would not print the names in petitions as appendices to the reports of the Senate. I have no objection to the petitions of Senators Fairbairn and Bonnell being printed. My point is that if we proceed in this way today, we will have to go back and do what I suggested three or four weeks ago.

Senator Flynn: Your point of order was well taken.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, on the same point of order, Senator Thériault is correct up to a certain point in what he has said. At that time I believe the names were being printed in the Minutes of the Proceedings and Hansard, which resulted in a hold-up in the printing of Hansard—because of translation, and so on—which delayed the delivery of these documents the next day. The Leader of the Government in the Senate had suggested that we find some other method. That is why, in my motion today—and I suspect that the same reasoning is behind the Honourable Senator Fairbairn's suggestion—I suggested that the petitions not be printed in Hansard, because to do so might delay the printing of Hansard, but that they be printed as an appendix at a later date. I also suggest that Senator Thériault's suggestion is proper, and that his list of names should be added to our lists and put in the one appendix at some later date.

Senator Thériault: If there is agreement, fine.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I do not think that decision was made in Senator Thériault's case. I remember very well that I objected at the time Senator Thériault introduced his petition. I did not object today because I thought that Senator Bonnell would have taken cognizance of the fact that we had decided that these petitions should not be printed in any way, that they should merely be tabled. Anyway, if we want, we can change it every day.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I think I should add just a word. I was not present in the Senate when this matter came under discussion. However, I have read the proceedings of that discussion. It seems to me an agreement was reached at the time that these petitions would indeed be tabled. It seems that the Senate rules are not very clear on this matter, but it was agreed, or there seemed to be agreement, that they would be tabled. At least, there was no contradiction of the suggestion that the rules of the other place would be followed in this case, which is our practice. It is my understanding that the printing of names, petitions, and so on, is not done in the other place. It certainly was not done in the House of Assembly from which I came. The presenter of the petition was given five minutes to speak to the prayer of the petition, and others could speak to the petition as well for the same length of time. Certainly the petitions and the names were not printed. I think it might be in the best interests of the Senate in the future if we were to follow the precedents established in other places.

• (1410)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, perhaps we could ask Senator Fairbairn and Senator Bonnell if they would withhold their motions until we have inquired whether we did make an agreement. Then we can do whatever we agreed to do.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, there is another reason for not printing the names of the petitioners at this time. There is such a position as Petitions Clerk in the Senate as there is in the other place, and the task of the clerk in charge of petitions is to ensure that petitions conform to the general practice and the rules. It seems to me that if we agreed that petitions could be published, they could only be published after the clerk has reviewed the text of the petition to ensure that it conforms to parliamentary style, practice, and what have you.

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, if I may just comment, I have no strong feelings on this matter. I thought we had agreed to something. My point is that I would like my petitions to be treated in the same way as everyone else's petitions.

Senator Bonnell: I think we are agreed that your petition should also be printed in the appendix.

Senator Thériault: It is very generous of you.

Senator Fairbairn: Honourable senators, if it is the wish of the Senate, I have no objection to withholding those petitions. However, in listening here to the discussion, it seems to me that there is some confusion as to what the policy is, and I would enter that as a caveat. I would withhold the petitions, pending clarification of what the position is on petitions.

Senator Frith: That is not quite what I was suggesting. I was not suggesting that you withhold the petitions but simply that you withhold the printing of those petitions until we find out what our agreement was. If we made an agreement, it should apply to everyone.

Senator Fairbairn: I am agreeable to withholding the printing of those petitions.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, on a point of order, I would like to suggest to the honourable senators that once a decision has been made by the Senate—which happened this afternoon—that the honourable senator's motion is put and carried, and then we get into a discussion on that motion.

Therefore, I would suggest to honourable senators, on a point of order, that all we can do now is carry out the wishes of the Senate, which is to print the petitions presented by the honourable senators as an appendix, together with the motion put by myself. Then I suggest that we refer the whole matter to the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders for a ruling on the procedure for the future so that honourable senators will know how, why, when and what we should do with respect to the presentation of petitions.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, is it agreed that the printing of the petitions presented this afternoon be withheld until a ruling as to the procedure can be obtained from the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

BILL TO AMEND (QUALIFICATION OF SENATORS)—FIRST READING

Hon. Len Marchand presented Bill S-12, to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 (Qualification of Senators).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Some Hon. Senators: Explain!

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, at this stage can we not have a brief explanation of the purpose of the bill?

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, it is really quite a simple matter. When I was first appointed to this place, the first words out of the mouth of the Prime Minister, Pierre Trudeau at the time, were, "Do you own $4,000 worth of property in the Province of British Columbia in freehold, fee simple?" Luckily, I said yes.

The purpose of this bill is to change that ridiculous law, because, in my situation, I have some property on the reservation as well. That property does not qualify for that $4,000 senatorial property requirement. I suppose at the time of Confederation $4,000 worth of property meant something. Today it really means nothing. It was a silly requirement then; it is a silly requirement now. I think we should do away with it.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jacques Flynn: On a point of order, the Law Clerk of the Senate, Mr. du Plessis, should look into the problem raised by presenting a bill to amend the BNA Act. I believe it can only be done by resolution. I would like the Law Clerk to look into it and find out if the way Senator Marchand wants to proceed is correct.

Senator Marchand: I am not sure of the significance of the intervention by Senator Flynn, but I am advised that we do not need to proceed by way of resolution. This amendment could be effected by this bill, through this institution and the Commons.

Senator Flynn: We have another problem with the resolution moved by Senator Godfrey that affects the qualification of senators. Senator Godfrey is moving by way of resolution, not by way of a bill. In substance, it may seem to be the same to the honourable senator, but, from a procedural viewpoint, you have to conform with the provisions related to the amendment of the Constitution, which require a resolution and not a bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, it seems to me that this is a rather extensive debate at first reading, but since we have come this far, there is one amendment to the Constitution that can be made not by a resolution but by a law under section 44.

44. Subject to sections 41 and 42, Parliament may exclusively make laws amending the Constitution of Canada in relation to the executive government of Canada or the Senate and House of Commons.

I agree with Senator Flynn that we should be sure that this falls within section 44. However, apparently it is possible to make that narrow range of amendments without a resolution.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, before presenting the bill, I was assured by the legal adviser of the Senate that this was the proper way to proceed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: May I suggest that we proceed to the second reading of the bill? It may be that when the bill is referred to the regular committee of the Senate this question of the Constitution will be discussed. Should we proceed in this way?

Senator Flynn: It is simply a warning.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Yes, but I have to put a motion before the Senate for second reading. Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Doody: With leave, at the next sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Doody, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-22

AVAILABILITY OF TRANSLATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE

On Reports of Committees:

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, it is my wish to table the report of the Special Committee on the Subject Matter of Bill C-22, but I have yet to receive the French translation. Rather than proceed with only the English translation at this time, I would ask for unanimous consent to revert to Reports of Committees later today, when the French translation comes in, so that I can table both versions at the same time.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that Senator Hastings finds himself in the same position with regard to reports of the Energy and Natural Resources Committee. He will also be asking for leave to revert to Reports of Committees later today.

FRESHWATER FISHERIES

RESPONSE OF FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MINISTERS TO INTERIM REPORT OF FISHERIES COMMITTEE—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, June 25, 1987, I will call the attention of the Senate to the responses of the federal and provincial ministers to the recommendations made by the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries in its Interim Report on the Freshwater Fisheries.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), moved:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Thursday next, June 25, 1987, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Motion agreed to.

TAX REFORM 1987

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO CONDUCT STUDY

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, yesterday I made reference to the documents that were tabled by the Leader of the Government in the Senate dealing with tax reform. With leave of the Senate, I now move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, which was authorized by the Senate on May 26, 1987, to study and report upon tax reform in Canada, or any matter relating thereto, be further authorized to examine and consider the documents tabled in the Senate on June 22, 1987, relating to tax reform 1987, (Sessional Papers No. 332-402).

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.
Motion agreed to.

TERRORISM AND PUBLIC SAFETY

SPECIAL SENATE COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO PUBLISH AND DISTRIBUTE REPORT DURING ADJOURNMENT

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), I move:

That the Special Committee of the Senate on Terrorism and Public Safety be authorized to publish and distribute its report on its consideration of matters relating to terrorism as a real or potential threat to Canada and to Canadians as soon as it becomes available, even though the Senate may not then be sitting.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps Senator Kelly would explain why he is asking for permission, and also tell us if there are precedents for it.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, as you may recall, the commitment of the committee was to complete its work by not later than June 30. I am pleased to report that the work has been done. Both the hearings and the report have been completed.

However, we have a technical problem that may frustrate our intention to table our report by June 30 as promised. The reason I offer this motion is to protect us in such an event. At the present time we still feel that we may meet our deadline. The report of the committee has been completed, and so far as the work of the committee is concerned it is within its budget. I believe it kept its commitment not to interfere with other committees. In doing so it met on weekends and in the evenings. It did not meet on Tuesday, Wednesday or Thursday evening. It met on Friday and Monday evening. If we miss in the timing of the tabling of the report, it will really be a near miss.

Senator Frith: Did you find any precedent for it?

Senator Kelly: Yes, honourable senators. I refer you to the Debates of the Senate of June 27, 1984, where, on a motion by, I believe, Senator Frith, the following committees were given leave to publish and distribute their reports as soon as they became available: the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs; the Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence; the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance; the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture, Fisheries and Forestry. I have a few more. There are several of them.

Senator Frith: With that sponsorship, that precedent is irresistible.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Is the honourable senator saying that the committee may need an extension of the date to present its report?

Senator Kelly: No. The reason for leave is that there is an outside possibility that the translation will not be completed in time for the report to be tabled.

Senator Flynn: So there may be a problem in presenting the report. If the terms of reference provide that the report should be tabled before June 30, and it is not ready on that date, you may need an extension of a few days.

Senator Frith: This, in effect, is an extension.

Senator Kelly: Honourable senators, it is just so long as I can be sure that we are safe. Let us not have a technical argument later on whereupon we shall have to scrap the whole thing and start all over again.

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.
Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Murray is not with us today. He is in Atlantic Canada. I will be pleased to take any questions as notice on his behalf, and I will do my best to obtain answers.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, on a point of order, would Senator Doody please clarify the term "Atlantic Canada"? Is that a new province?

● (1430)

Senator Doody: That is an area represented geographically by at least four provinces, and sometimes Quebec is included. Generally speaking, that refers to the maritime provinces and Newfoundland, although not exclusively. As I said, sometimes Quebec is included.

CANADA-FRANCE FISHERIES AND BOUNDARIES AGREEMENT

NEGOTIATIONS TO ESTABLISH FISHING QUOTAS IN CANADIAN WATERS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I ask Senator Doody to take notice of the following questions: Has the Government of France postponed the negotiations on the establishment of fishing quotas in Canadian waters? If so, has there been a date set for the resumption of the discussions? Is the postponement related to the closing of Canadian ports to vessels of the Metropolitaine fleet and the Saint Pierre and Miquelon fleets, and has the Government of France used those two events as a reason for the postponement?

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I will make inquiries to seek an answer at the earliest opportunity.

BRITISH COLUMBIA

SOUTH MORESBY—ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL PARK— STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, I ask Senator Doody to take notice of the following question: I learned via the news media that discussions between Prime Minister Mulroney and Premier Vander Zalm have taken place regarding the setting aside of South Moresby Island as a National Park. I am not sure what that means, but I wonder if Senator Doody could bring to the Senate a report as to what is going to happen and tell us whether formal negotiations are going to take place. I am interested in knowing how this whole matter will proceed.

The news of the discussion between the Prime Minister and the Premier last evening was indeed good news, because every effort should be made to set aside this world heritage site for the use of all mankind.

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): I appreciate the senator's concern, and I will try to obtain information for him.

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, will Senator Murray be in attendance on Thursday and Friday?

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Murray will certainly be present on Thursday.

AGRICULTURE

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS TO WESTERN GRAIN FARMERS FOR 1987 CROP YEAR

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have tried for several days to get an answer from the Honourable Senator Murray regarding whether or not the government intends to have an acreage deficiency payment for the 1987 crop year.

I now ask the Acting Leader of the Government to make inquiries of the Minister of Agriculture and the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board to relieve the anxiety western grain farmers now have as a result of not knowing whether or not the government intends to bring in a plan for the 1987 crop year.

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): I will attempt to get an answer for the honourable senator.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS THE CABINET

CONFLICT-OF-INTEREST INQUIRIES—ASSUMPTION OF MINISTERS' LEGAL COSTS

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised in the Senate on March 12, 1987, by the Honourable Senator Stewart, regarding the Cabinet—Conflict-of-Interest Inquiries—Assumption of Ministers' Legal Costs.

A judicial committee of inquiry has been established, under the Federal Inquiries Act, to investigate allegations that Mr. Stevens violated government conflict-of-interest guidelines.

As these allegations were made while Mr. Stevens was serving as a minister of the Crown, and related to his performance in that capacity, the government decided it was appropriate that he be assisted in defraying the costs of his legal counsel.

In similar circumstances, previous governments have paid the legal fees of ministers, i.e. Francis Fox, Warren Allmand and Jean-Pierre Goyer.

TRANSPORT

POSSIBLE ABANDONMENT OF MONTREAL-SUDBURY RAILWAY SERVICE—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on May 26 last by the Honourable Senator Le Moyne regarding Transport—Possible Abandonment of Montreal-Sudbury Railway Service—Government Policy.

Under pressures of a keen financial and competitive market, each railway is taking a very hard look at its railway network and in particular any uneconomic lines, with a view to maintaining commercial viability. For example, CN has stated on several occasions that about one-third of its total trackage carries 90 per cent of its traffic; another one-third carries only 1 per cent of total traffic.

However, any move by a railway company to abandon a line would first require application to the Canadian Transport Commission or its pending successor under Bill C-18, the new National Transportation Agency, which would give careful consideration to economic factors, public and private interests, alternative modes of service, et cetera, before making a decision to either authorize or disallow abandonment of a railway line.

CN applications to abandon two lines between Montreal and Sudbury have not been filed with the Canadian Transport Commission (CTC). Another point worthy of mention is that the CTC would very probably convene public hearings should indeed CN file applications to abandon the lines in question.

Meanwhile, the railway is obliged, under the existing Railway Act or the pending National Transportation Act (C-18), to accommodate all traffic offered to it on the line.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION—STUDENT ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

Hon. C. William Doody (Acting Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer in response to a question asked in the Senate on May 27 last by the Honourable Senator Marchand regarding Aboriginal Peoples—Post-Secondary Education—Student Assistance Programs.

On May 14 of this year, the Honourable Bill McKnight, Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, announced a budget of $93.7 million to be used for Indian post-secondary education assistance for the 1987-88 fiscal year. This amount is approximately $12 million more than what was set aside for Indian post-secondary education for the preceding fiscal year. In addition, the May 14 announcement stated that additional moneys would be made available for Indian students registered pursuant to Bill C-31. In making the above announcement, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development also indicated that, unlike previous years, during the 1987-88 fiscal year there would be no further increases in the amount provided for in the budget.

The Government of Canada has demonstrated its commitment to post-secondary Indian education by providing post-secondary educational assistance to Indian and Inuit students over the years. During the last 10 years the budget has grown from $8 million to $81 million, or ten times what it was a decade ago. Similarly, the number of Indian students attending post-secondary institutions has also increased over the years. Ten years ago there were approximately 3,500 Indians in post-secondary institutions, now there are approximately 12,000.

However, in spite of the $12 million budget increase for this fiscal year, the federal government may find itself in a position of having more applicants for assistance than it can support. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development must therefore take measures to ensure that the available budget is allocated fairly and sensibly, and stretched as far as possible. For this reason, the following system of priorities has been announced for the 1987-88 fiscal year.

- All Indian and Inuit students who were enrolled in post-secondary studies in 1986-87 and are continuing in 1987-88 will continue to receive their post-secondary educational assistance. Students whose applications were deferred in the 1986-87 fiscal year will also be approved as submitted.

- Eligible high school students or mature students who are enrolling for the first time, and Indian and Inuit students enrolling in college preparation programs or in post-graduate and professional courses, will be eligible for assistance, providing there are sufficient funds available.

- Eligible applicants who are returning to post-secondary studies after having previously dropped out of college or university will only receive assistance once the applicants in the previous categories have received assistance, if there are funds available.

- Where students are refused assistance this year due to a lack of funds, these applicants will be deferred, and they will qualify as second priority students in the following year. As well, additional moneys have been made available for students who have now been registered as Indians pursuant to Bill C-31.

As announced on May 14 by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the above priority system has been established to ensure that the funds available be used in a fair and sensible manner.

BELL CANADA BILL

SECOND READING

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Kelly, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bie-lish, for the second reading of the Bill C-13, An Act respecting the reorganization of Bell Canada.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, last Thursday Senator Kelly introduced Bill C-13 and in so doing set up its background and emphasized the several favourable things that are to be said for this bill, as he should since he is sponsoring it. He did not refer, and I do not criticize him for not doing so, to some of the controversy that has surrounded this bill. He did not highlight areas of concern.

He also did not refer to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on the subject matter of the bill. I propose to draw the attention of the Senate to some of the concerns about this bill and to refer to the report of our committee and how it dealt with those concerns.

As Senator Kelly said, the requirement of this bill is based on two events. One was the placing of Bell Canada under the general law of corporations in Canada, and the second was the reorganization of Bell Canada and the establishment of Bell Canada Enterprises.

One is inclined to think about the bill in terms of two sides: one in favour of the bill, that is, Bell Canada; and the other against the bill, that is, the consumer advocate societies and others. In fact, both Bell Canada and others appearing at the hearings connected with the bill had criticisms of it.

The complaint of Bell Canada essentially is that they would be over-regulated by the CRTC under Bill C-13 and that their competitiveness would thus be hindered. Some consumer and public advocacy groups, however, believe the bill does not go far enough. We have Bell Canada taking a position that the bill goes too far and others saying that it does not go far enough.

The concern, essentially, of those who feel that the bill does not go far enough is that the parent company, BCE, would be able to use Bell Canada and its subscribers as—to use the rather colourful and bucolic metaphor—“a cash cow.” Honourable senators, that is not my phrase, it is a phrase that was used by the opponents of the bill. The concern is that BCE could use Bell Canada, the regulated company, as a “cash cow”, and the income from that regulated company, with its monopoly, could be used for enterprises that are not regulated.

The CRTC was asked to study the bill, and it took the position that the bill was made necessary, as I have said, because of the Certificate of Continuance pursuant to the Canada Business Corporations Act, 1982, bringing Bell

Canada under the same corporate laws as are applicable to other federally incorporated corporations, and because of the corporate reorganization.

If we consider the positions that were taken on this bill, we will see that they fall into four categories. The first is that the bill is fair and does nothing but restore the commission's regulatory power over the telephone operations of Bell Canada. That was the position taken by the CRTC and CNCP. The second is that the bill does not go far enough and will allow Bell Canada and its parent, BCE, to avoid the regulation it always had to respect. That was the position of the public interest advocacy group. The third is that the effect of the old bill, Bill C-19—and this is essentially the same—would be to over-regulate Bell Canada and hinder its ability to perform in a world that is becoming more and more competitive. The fourth is that the bill should be dropped altogether until the government makes up its mind on the question of deregulation in the telecommunications sector.

As Senator Kelly pointed out, the objective—in view of those two background factors, that is, the business corporation and the reorganization of Bell—was to try to enable Bell Canada to stay in the regulated area and keep its monopoly on telephone service, but to allow the overall and parent company, BCE and other subsidiaries to engage in competitive activity.

As I mentioned, the CRTC examined Bell Canada's reorganization with a view to determining its effect on the rates of Bell subscribers and on the ability of the CRTC to regulate Bell Canada. With one notable exception, Bill C-13 incorporates those recommendations of the CRTC, which require legislative provision. Senator Kelly pointed that out. The notable or sole exception was the recommendation that a legislative provision be enacted empowering the CRTC to direct that a minority shareholding interest in Bell be established, if necessary. The CRTC argued that a minority shareholding could provide a significant incentive for Bell's directors to conduct the company's activities, especially intercorporate transactions, in the best interests of both its subscribers and shareholders.

This eventually became what Senator Kelly and others have referred to as the "in" and "out" provisions. The scheme of the act—and some say that it did not go far enough—was to permit the CRTC, where necessary, to get information and deal with activities that flowed from the monopoly and regulated area through to the non-regulated and non-monopolistic or competitive area. Senator Kelly felt that those sections satisfied the "in" and "out" requirements and the ability of the CRTC to reach beyond the Bell Canada Corporation, which is clearly within its regulatory power whereas the other emanations would not be.

There were other objections to the bill other than clauses 11, 12 and 13, although they were the principal ones. There was some concern, for example, with clause 6 which provides for a six-month prepayment. The position generally taken on that provision was that it would never happen but that the power should be there.

There was also some concern about clause 7. Clause 7, in the eyes of some critics, provided a possibility for BCE, for example, to become involved in cable television. The Canadian Cable Television Association expressed the fear that a gap in clause 7 could have a major impact on members of the Canadian Cable Television Association and, therefore, on the industry. Its concern was expressed to the minister, but the minister did not take those concerns seriously. If the word "affiliate" were added to the clause, it might solve the problem of the cable industry. However, the government was not prepared to make that change.

Clause 11 of the bill provides that any sale by Bell Canada Enterprises of more than 20 per cent of the shares of Bell Canada must receive CRTC approval. That clause was welcomed by critics of the bill who previously felt that there would be no limit in the bill as it appeared at the outset.

Another objection was that the requirement in clause 11 for CRTC approval could be circumvented if a company acquired control of BCE itself. I believe that that is why that clause was provided for regulation by the CRTC in the case of more than 20 per cent of the shares of Bell being acquired.

There was also an objection that there was a lack of effective mechanism to obtain information, which brings us to clauses 11, 12 and 13. In closing, I will turn to the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Our committee heard quite a large number of witnesses in the course of its pre-study in December. If honourable senators are interested, they will find the report in the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate No. 17, for Tuesday, December 16, 1986, at pages 176 to 179. On page 179 there is a list of the witnesses who were heard and the dates of the hearings. That occupies a full page and carries over to page 180.

The committee confirmed the analysis of the bill by Senator Kelly that the essence of the bill was as we have described it and focused on clauses 11, 12 and 13. At page 177 it states as follows:

Clause 11 would require BCE to obtain CRTC approval for the sale of Bell Canada shares if such a sale would reduce BCE's ownership of Bell to less than 80%. This would enable the Commission to review any future reorganization of Bell to ensure that the interests of subscribers are safeguarded.

Clause 12—

As we have noted—

—would empower CRTC to obtain from BCE such information as it deems necessary for the regulation of Bell Canada.

Clause 13 would authorize CRTC to direct Bell Canada—

And this is important——to divest itself of any competitive telecommunications activity, or to take over from an affiliate activities which are not sufficiently competitive. The purpose of this power is to ensure that Bell could not a) subsidize competitive activities with revenues from monopoly services, or b) escape regulation of certain activities by shifting them to non-regulated affiliates.

The committee says that:

With the exception of Bell Canada, all the witnesses appearing before the Committee expressed support for the Bill with few reservations.

The strongest criticism was directed to clause 13, which is the one that gives the CRTC that extra power to order divestiture over affiliates.

On page 178 it goes on to state that:

All other witnesses before the Committee argued that the "in" and "out" powers under clause 13 are necessary to safeguard the interests of subscribers and competitors from predatory practices by Bell. They made the point that, in the absence of the "in" powers, it may be possible for Bell to remove from regulation certain monopoly activities by shifting them to unregulated affiliates.

The next paragraph states:

The one other section of the Bill which received substantial comment was clause 12. Most witnesses took the view that the wording of that clause should be amended to state explicitly that CRTC will have authority to obtain information not only from the controlling parent of Bell but also from Bell's affiliated companies. CRTC officials, however, testified that such an amendment was unnecessary because the present wording in clause 12 would provide CRTC with authority to obtain, through BCE, any relevant information pertaining to a Bell Canada affiliate. They cited the case of Interprovincial Pipe Lines Ltd. v. The National Energy Board [1978] 1 F.C. 601 in which the Federal Court of Appeal ruled that IPL had to provide to NEB, in a meaningful form, information involving an IPL subsidiary located in the U.S. In light of this, it is the Committee's view that the provisions of clause 12 as they stand are adequate for the purpose intended.

The committee closed by saying that:

Your Committee has reviewed the subject-matter of Bill C-13 in accordance with the Order of Reference and, except as noted above, has no comment to make.

Honourable senators, it is clear that our committee, in making its study of the subject matter of the bill, took into account the various reservations and concerns that I have located through the research that I have done. I am sure that the CRTC recognizes its responsibilities, as does the government, to monitor the concerns that were expressed during the many hearings held on this bill.

Since our committee has heard witnesses when studying the subject matter of the bill, I see no reason to have the bill go back to that committee, nor do I see any reason why the bill should not, subject to these reservations, receive second reading today.

[Senator Frith.]

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

● (1450)

The Hon. the Speaker pro tempore: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

On motion of Senator Doody, bill placed on the Orders of the Day for third reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Cogger, seconded by the Honourable Senator David, for the second reading of the Bill C-22, An act to amend the Patent Act and to provide for certain matters in relation thereto.—(Honourable Senator Doody).

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I have indicated on various occasions, I have no desire to speak to this order. However, Senator Cogger, who introduced the bill, is prepared to speak at second reading. When he speaks it will have the effect of closing the debate at second reading. I understand that other members of the Senate would like to participate in the debate. Perhaps this order could be stood in the name of one of the honourable senators on the other side who wishes to speak.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I am quite prepared to speak in this debate today.

Senator Doody: Then I yield to Senator Buckwold.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, it has been my privilege to be a member of the Special Committee of the Senate on Bill C-22 which has crossed Canada to hear the views of Canadians on this important matter. That committee has reported to you. I think its report is a very factual one, though it really does not make the kind of recommendations that I personally would like to make in talking to you about Bill C-22.

Let me refer to the committee. In spite of protests from some members of this chamber that the committee was an extravagant waste of public funds, in almost every city we went to, and we visited the capital cities of all the provinces, people making representations indicated their extreme pleasure and appreciation that the Senate was there to listen to them. The representations were on both sides of the subject. Some presentations were strongly in favour of the bill. A great majority of the representations were in opposition to the bill. I shall not go into too much detail, because it is outlined in the report, and undoubtedly our chairman will do this in due course. I am not quite sure of the mechanics of the procedure, but I felt it incumbent upon me to speak today before the debate was closed.

In my opinion, Bill C-22 is probably one of the worst pieces of legislation to be presented to this chamber or this Parliament of Canada in many years. It upsets what has proven to be a very effective plan which was devised in 1969 by the Government of Canada to allow, for the first time, generic competition in the drug industry. Until that time drug prices in Canada were among the highest in the world. Drug prices were so outrageous that several commissions and studies were undertaken to review prices, the causes of these prices, and possible solutions. Canada, in its own unique way, came up with a system for allowing generic competition. I do not have to tell you that the scheme was not popular with the multinational pharmaceutical manufacturers. Any of you who were around at that time will recall the intense lobbying that went on and the dire predictions of what would happen to health care in Canada if the competition of generic drugs was allowed.

The last report commissioned a few years ago was chaired by Dr. Eastman. There had been pressure again for yet another review. Dr. Eastman presented his report with which many of you are familiar and which was highly recognized across the country. After an extensive and very inclusive review of the prescription drug situation, Dr. Eastman made several recommendations. First, let me tell you some of his general comments. He said that since 1969 Canada has enjoyed continuing lower prices on drugs than what otherwise would have been the case. Because of generic competition, prescription drug prices are lower now than they have ever been on a competitive basis. Dr. Eastman concluded that the Canadian legislation was the reason for these lower prices. In addition to the fact that we have lower generic drug costs as a result of the competition, patent drug prices are also lower in Canada than they are in the United States. Let me give one example. I am sure that we are all aware of the drug Valium. I have used these statistics in the committee hearings several times, and they have never been challenged. I think they are correct. If one bought Valium at a supermarket in the United States, one would pay $32.09 Canadian for 100 pills. If one bought name-brand Valium in Canada, one would pay $14.57 cents. The price of the generic brand would be $5.96. What I am saying is that as a result of the competition of generic drugs, we not only have lower priced generic drugs but we have also brought down the cost of the name brand drugs. If we pass Bill C-22, many of these lower prices will be eliminated. I am the first to admit that the generic drugs now on the shelf will continue to be for sale. On the other hand, about 40 new drugs are in the pipeline right now ready to go on to the market, after years of extensive research and testing to meet Canadian requirements, and they will not be available for purchase. In his report Dr. Eastman recognized that something had to be done to help protect the patent rights of companies with those patented drugs. He suggested a four-year period of exclusivity and, in addition, that a substantial additional payment of 10 per cent should be charged to the generic company, which would go to those companies that do a portion of their research in Canada. This would be in addition to the 4 per cent royalty which is already levied on generic companies. In assessing the program, Dr. Eastman said that in 1983 Canadians were estimated to have saved $211 million because of this competition.

So, why is the government suddenly changing the rules? I must admit that if I were sitting on the other side I would wonder what the government's reasoning is, when almost everybody is happy with the situation that we have in Canada, and when we enjoy the envy of the world in the way we have handled our drug pricing. There is no nation in the free world, other than the United States and South Africa, that does not have some form of control over drug prices, though their control is not the same as Canada's, which is unique. However, most of them have price controls, review boards—most of which are not very effective, but, nevertheless, limit profits—and various other means to counteract the monopoly power of multinationals with respect to patented drugs that can save lives. As we pointed out in our committee report, patent protection for drugs is different from patent protection for a mousetrap, or—as Senator Cogger recalls—a doorknob.

Honourable senators, what I am saying to you is that we have had a very successful piece of legislation in Canada. We have been able to provide drugs to Canadians at reasonable prices, and the drug corporations have continued to be as profitable as they have ever been. Here I am speaking of the multinationals. Also, they have continued to give their modest contribution to research and development, namely, approximately 4.5 to 5 per cent of sales.

Canada is not a major player in the drug field in that we use approximately 2 per cent of the world's drugs. On the other hand, the cost of promoting drugs—as pointed out by Dr. Eastman—is really amazing. The companies spend approximately 4.5 to 5 per cent on research and development; they make approximately 15 per cent profit at the end of the year, and they spend 21 per cent of their sales on promotion and advertising of their drugs. To me, honourable senators, that is a little bit astounding.

The industry has said: "Give us this new bill and we will spend $1.4 billion on research in the next ten years." I have to believe them. Some people doubt it, but I am one of those who said: "Yes, they can do it." However, overall, let us look at it. Will it make that much difference to Canadian health? According to the drug lobby, it will provide 3,000 jobs in Canada by the end of the next ten years, and that is beneficial. However, the price that we are going to pay, honourable senators, is hardly worth the promises of drug companies to do the research that they say they will do.

Honourable senators, it hurt the committee on several occasions to have individuals appear before the committee and plead with us to pass this bill because, if we did not, their child, who had some disease, would not get the kind of health care through drugs that otherwise might be available; that in refusing to pass this bill, Canada would not enjoy the high standard in drug availability that we have come to expect. Time and time again in the committee I asked: "Due to the legislation on our books, has Canada suffered a poor quality of drug care or poor availability of drugs?" The answer is that there may occasionally have been some delay, but not because of the legislation. Rather is it because of the problems in proving generic drugs through the normal channels, and delays sometimes take place due to Canadian regulations.

Therefore, honourable senators, I think all of us, even those who fully support this bill, would agree that over the last several years Canadians have enjoyed good prescription drug care; that we are getting the best drugs that are available. I hope that through the research that will be done, either under this bill or otherwise, the multinationals will come up with significant discoveries that will help the people of the world. But again, as I say, Canada is generally a small player.

Dr. Eastman pointed out in his report that geographically Canada is really not a place where the multinationals are likely to do significant and important research. I am not minimizing what is being done, but the drug companies, multinationally, generally do their major research in their home countries, whether it be the U.S., Switzerland, West Germany or the United Kingdom. Those countries are, in fact, where a good deal of that research is being carried out.

Therefore, honourable senators, what I am really saying to you is that we have a fine scheme; we have an acceptable scheme; we have a scheme that has made possible drug prices in this country that are the envy of the world. It has encouraged provincial governments to finance prescription drug plans for their citizens, and I will touch upon that later when I get into the provincial reactions to this bill.

Honourable senators, I wonder really why the government has taken this step. I must admit that I have not seen any documents and I have not had anyone brief me, but during the hearings of the committee brief after brief said point-blank—and it has never really been denied—that this bill is part of the free trade deal; that somewhere along the line the U.S., which is irked by the fact that Canada has not, in their opinion, protected intellectual property in a satisfactory way, is insisting that the level playing field has to be established in order that free trade between our two countries can be looked at seriously. Document after document that I have seen and statements by some of our friends in the United States in positions of authority have indicated that that is the case. In fact, the multinational drug lobby in the U.S. has been very effective in making sure that the American authorities have used this leverage of free trade to bring in Bill C-22, which will add, as I will point out later, hundreds of millions of dollars over the next few years to the cost of drugs in this country.

Honourable senators, it would be a very sad commentary, indeed, if, by any chance, we did not manage to reach a free trade agreement. In that event, if this bill is passed, the citizens of Canada who are drug users will be burdened with drug prices, as a result of Bill C-22, that would otherwise not be necessary. It seems to me that the least we can do is wait until we have a free trade deal, then perhaps we can take another look. At the moment we are putting into legislation something that could be very costly and expensive for the citizens of Canada.

[Senator Buckwold.]

Honourable senators, who uses the drugs? The elderly are the main drug users. In fact, 10 per cent of the population buys 25 per cent of the drugs. So we are really looking at the effects of this bill on those who are least able to afford higher drug prices. We who sit in the Senate, representing our regions, our groups and our communities, have a responsibility to make sure that undue burdens are not placed on those people.

The committee had a series of representations made by the provinces, and I think the Senate must be aware of the provinces. They are the ones who are financing major drug programs. The three provinces that support the bill did not appear before the committee nor did they send in any representation. I was not present at the hearings in Quebec, and I am not sure if there was official representation made at that time. However, it is clear that the Government of Quebec does support this bill. It supports this bill together with the Governments of Alberta and Saskatchewan on the basis that new industry will come into their provinces and that there will be new jobs. Honourable senators, that is certainly admirable. I can understand their desire to provide and develop some industry. However, in my opinion, it is a very short-sighted policy.

Honourable senators, I look at my own province of Saskatchewan that is ready to support this bill. However, a few days after our committee was in Regina, the Government of Saskatchewan put a new burden on the people of Saskatchewan by changing what was probably the best prescription drug plan in Canada in which there was universal coverage. In other words, everyone had free drugs on the payment of a small prescription fee, which I believe was $3.95. Honourable senators, as I say, that was the best program in Canada.

In order to save money, the Government of Saskatchewan has now changed that plan to conform with the Manitoba plan whereby there is a deductible of $125 per family and a lower amount for senior citizens, and so on. I will not go into the details. However, honourable senators, at the very same time as the Province of Saskatchewan, desperate for funds to maintain its basic health services and dealing with the pressures of government deficits with all kinds of closings, firings and elimination of programs, to my shame as a citizen of that province, supports this bill—at the same time it changes its drug plan so that it will cost the citizens a great deal more money for their drugs than it has in the past; particularly those citizens who can least afford to pay.

Honourable senators, I am not attempting to take away from the discussion by our chairman, but let me read from our report. The Province of Ontario indicates that in their opinion the cost of the program in the next ten years could be up to $1 billion. This is in spite of the fact that the minister, Mr. Andre, says that we have a drug price control board, and that that control board will make sure that the costs will go no higher than increases in the Consumer Price Index. I heard him say in the House of Commons that there was just no way drug prices would exceed the cost of living. Within the next few weeks the Government of Canada announced $100 million for the provinces, to cover them during the next four years for additional costs which they will have in their provincial plans, because generic drugs that were expected to be on the market will not be there as a result of this legislation. I cannot imagine a more blatant admission of what is happening; that is, on the one hand, prices will not go up, and, on the other hand, providing $100 million to the provinces.

Every province and the two territories that appeared before us—and I will not go through the list—indicated that their costs were going to be considerably higher. They advised us that drugs are not necessarily the major cost of health care and admitted that good drugs will cut down on the need for hospitalization. Drug therapy is a very important part of treatment today. Nevertheless, they said that it was absolutely essential to maintain the system we have and keep generic drugs available.

The drug prices review board is what the government places its confidence in, proclaiming that we will live in a world where drug prices will be very modestly increased, if at all. What control do we have with prices today? New drugs come on the market. There is no generic competition. It takes up to six years to develop a new generic drug, but at least there is that kind of protection.

Our friends of the government have pointed out that the drug prices review board would have an opportunity to review those drug prices that are too high. However, I would like to remind honourable senators that new drug prices are not going to be reviewed, but only increases in prices would be subject to scrutiny. There is nothing in the legislation that really gives teeth to the drug prices review board. All they could do, after a series of hearings and studies, would be to take away the protection given that drug against generic competition. Believe me, by the time these complaints get through the courts, that drug will be outdated. There will be something else on the market.

In my opinion there is little real protection. There are a lot of other variables on how prices are judged, and I will not take the time of the Senate to give you a list of the criteria that are required in order to justify price increases. There is a whole series, one of which is the Consumer Price Index.

You are dealing with multinational drug companies. There is what is called transfer pricing on drugs brought from one country into another, and who knows what they really cost? Who knows what the research and development costs are worldwide? It is a very important and powerful industry, and one which, in the past, Canada has recognized as necessary to control.

Honourable senators, in my opinion, if we pass this bill we will be doing a great disservice to the people of Canada. We will be adding to the problem of health costs. We will be denying drugs to people who otherwise would have bought them, and who desperately need them. I plead with my fellow senators at this time to take a very good look at this bill; read the report carefully; read what the people of Canada have had to say, from consumers' associations to the Canadian Legion, from old age pensioners to hospital groups. Find out what they tell us. I believe there were over 200 representations made to the committee.

I think you will agree with me that to pass this legislation now would be to place a burden on the citizens of this country which is unnecessary and uncalled for.

Hon. Charles McElman: The Honourable Senator Thériault is absent at this time for medical reasons. He has asked me to adjourn the debate in his name, which I do.

On motion of Senator McElman, for Senator Thériault, debate adjourned.

Your Committee, which was authorized to study and report upon the proposed sale of Dome Petroleum Limited with particular reference to the impact of the sale on Canada, or any matter relating thereto, respectfully requests that the date of presenting its final report be extended from 30th June, 1987 to no later than 31st March, 1988.

Respectfully submitted,

On motion of Senator Hastings, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-22

AVAILABILITY OF TRANSLATION OF REPORT OF COMMITTEE

On Reports of Committees:

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, the French translation of my report has not yet arrived. If the Senate were to agree, I could give my report in English, and when the French translation comes in I can table it. In the meantime, with unanimous consent, I would like to make a few remarks today to get this report before the Senate in order to proceed with this legislation. If you agree unanimously that I may table the English text now and table the French text when it comes in, I would like to proceed.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, I do not know when the French version of this report will reach us. If it comes to within ten or fifteen minutes, I shall not object to our proceeding, but if it is not ready before Thursday, I would like to adjourn consideration of the report until we have received it.

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: I do not think it will be that late.

[English]

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to grant permission?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, to the best of my knowledge, according to my clerk—if you can depend on your clerk—

Senator Doody: If you cannot depend on your clerk, who can you depend on?

Senator Bonnell: —I am told that it should be ready by 3:30 p.m. It is now 3:35 p.m. He is a little late. Perhaps I can speak in English for a few minutes. I do want to help the government as much as possible by proceeding and not waste another day. Otherwise, we would have to wait until Thursday, because Wednesday is St. Jean Baptiste Day.

An Hon. Senator: Wait for it!

Senator Bonnell: However, I will wait, since that is the wish.

[Translation]

Senator Leblanc (Saurel): Honourable senators, I do not want us to proceed immediately with this report if we do not have it in both official languages. I believe that we should wait until we have the two versions.

[Senator Hastings.]

● (1520)

[English]

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I believe we have two points of order here. One has to do with the translation of the report into the other official language, and the other has to do with the timing of the debate. As a rule, I think we have to table reports in this house and then proceed to discuss them at a later date, after members have had a chance to read them.

I think that two questions of leave are involved here. I do not like to be difficult about this, but this is a lengthy report comprising some 22 pages. I think it is unusual to have the debate commence before members who are not on the committee have had a chance to read it. Unless there are very important reasons which the chairman of the committee might state, I would be inclined to think that we should wait until the report has been distributed and read.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it the wish of honourable senators to wait until the report is presented in both official languages?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE—MOTION TO TELEVISE PROCEEDINGS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rousseau:

That pool television cameras be permitted in the Senate Chamber for the purpose of recording the proceedings of a Committee of the Whole with respect to its hearings on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to; and

That the proceedings be televised pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe that the steering committee met yesterday under the chairmanship of Senator Molgat. I suggest that we resolve into Committee of the Whole to receive a report.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, on a point of order, I believe that we are on Order No. 5.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: I would like this order to stand, because it has something to do with the report.

Senator Frith: Senator Flynn and I agreed that this order would stand.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Order No. 5 stands.
Order stands.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—
CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONTINUED

On the Order:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake constitutional accord and texts subsequently agreed to, the Honourable Senator Gildas L. Molgat in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, your steering committee met yesterday afternoon and has agreed to call two witnesses, it is hoped by the end of June. Following that, the deliberations may be adjourned to the fall, depending on what the steering committee decides. The steering committee recommends that the first witness be a spokesman for the government, and that the second witness be our former colleague, the Honourable Eugene Forsey. Senator Doody was to arrange for the appearance of the government witness. In a conversation with me earlier today, he reported that it may not be possible to get witnesses within the next few days; that is, before the normal summer adjournment of the Senate. Senator Forsey, on the other hand, is available whenever we wish to have him.

What is the wish of honourable senators?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I discussed earlier with Senator Doody the fact that it may not be possible for someone on behalf of the government to respond to the invitation extended by the steering committee to appear to explain or take us through the Meech Lake accord and the Langevin agreement. We have, for example, suggested Mr. Spector. I understand that the government feels it might be well represented by Mr. Spector, perhaps the Deputy Minister of Justice and perhaps someone else.

Senator Doody: Senator Murray.

Senator Frith: Yes, Senator Murray. That, I think, is understandable. In that case, however, I think that we should proceed with Senator Forsey.

I should also say that Senator Doody and I suggested the possibility of a witness from the world of academe, such as Professor Beaudoin of the University of Ottawa. He, like Senator Forsey, is a recognized expert on constitutional matters. I believe that Senator Doody is taking that question under advisement and may wish to speak to Professor Beaudoin. In the meantime, I suggest that we find a convenient time this week or at the beginning of next week to hear Senator Forsey.

If I may, I should also say that because of the connection between Order No. 5 and this order, I discussed with Senator Flynn the standing of Order No. 5, which is the motion that we televise our hearings. He and I have tentatively decided to consider televising the hearings at which Senator Forsey and Professor Beaudoin, for example, will appear. We might agree to the televising of those two hearings without agreeing to the motion contained in Order No. 5. In other words, we might first permit the televising of those two hearings and use that as an experience to see how it works.

Senator Flynn is going to think about that over St. Jean Baptiste Day, and we will talk about it again on Thursday. We have not come to any agreement about that, but I do think senators might be interested to know that that is a possibility we are considering.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, if I may add a point of clarification on the very lucid explanation given by Senator Frith, I want to make it clear that Senator Murray, Mr. Spector and the other gentlemen have not declined to appear. It is just that in view of the several days available between now and June 30, it would be impossible for them to fit that appearance around their particular timetables. They are quite prepared to appear and, indeed, are anxious to appear.

As for Professor Beaudoin, that name was mentioned to me. I would be reluctant to approach him myself. Just about everybody else in this chamber is far more qualified, both in terms of academe and in terms of law, to persuade the honourable gentleman to appear. I would leave that to our chairman.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether Professor Beaudoin is to appear as a sort of vicarious spokesman for the government or not. I thought that our understanding was that the most orderly way to proceed was to have the government take us through this document, stating its understanding of it. I have no objection to the appearance of two or three spokesmen, because it may well be that one is more competent on one section than another. But we are beginning to proceed in a less than efficient manner when we have two private sector persons coming in before the government has had a chance to put its views before this house. Are we being told that representatives of the government will not be able to appear before the summer adjournment of the House of Commons?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I was not trying to tell anybody anything. I reported this morning to our chairman on the message that I received from Senator Murray to the effect that it was impossible for the three prospective witnesses to get their various timetables to coincide with our schedule. I was asked to inquire of them if they could be available on Thursday or Friday of this week or on Monday or Tuesday of next week. They checked and found that their timetables were such as to make that impossible. I am not saying that the government spokesmen have refused to appear or are not going to appear. I am simply saying that the dates that I was given for their appearances were not given to them in sufficient time to allow them to make the necessary arrangements. They are not at all averse to coming. I was not suggesting that Professor Beaudoin would be a government spokesman, vicarious or otherwise. I simply suggested his name because it was passed on to me by someone else. I would not for the world ask the professor to become a government spokesman.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Chairman, it is highly desirable that before the adjournment we have a statement from the government; and if the three persons whose names have been mentioned by Senator Doody are not available, then perhaps two of them could find a day on which they could come, or perhaps one could come on the understanding that he or she could say, "Well, there are certain parts of the agreement on which I am not the highest authority." But surely the government can find someone to come forward before the adjournment to state its understanding of this important agreement.

Senator Doody: As a messenger, I have delivered the message. If the chairman and Senator Stewart wish to pass on these observations, and so on, to Senator Murray, then certainly, by all means, they may do so. I would not attempt to interfere. I was given certain directives at the steering committee. I was given a message to deliver. I dutifully did that this morning, and scurried back to my peers with the answer. I have fulfilled my duties.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the government's representative on the steering committee or the principal majority spokesmen in this house and on the committee, Senators MacEachen and Frith, could tell us what the steering committee has decided in terms of schedules, number of witnesses, and so forth.

If I understood correctly, there are voices in favour of having someone testify on behalf of the government and possibly Professor Beaudoin and others. I believe Senators Frith and Flynn are trying to agree on whether we should have tentative TV coverage of the proceedings.

I would like to know whether the Liberal majority is in a hurry to start the work in Committee of the Whole, and whether you intend to proceed at full speed and work all summer, or whether the Liberal majority intends to produce only a few witnesses, then adjourn for the summer. I would appreciate being given the rules of the game, if there are any.

We read in the papers that Mr. Trudeau may be invited now or later. So what are we going to do with this committee? If there is no rush, then I suppose we will have all summer to settle the problem of TV coverage.

What can the representatives of the majority tell us about the number of witnesses, and when and how often the committee intends to sit?

This morning I read another rumour in one of the papers that the Senate Committee of the Whole might wait until the Joint Committee of the House of Commons and the Senate finished its work and made sufficient progress before proceeding with its own work. I wish we were given some clarification on what the majority intends to do.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, as the majority we have no plan as such. We are merely discussing the matter of letting the steering committee decide on the agenda and how we are to proceed.

[Senator Doody.]

As was pointed out by the committee chairman, my suggestion was to start with two witnesses and then decide whether or not we will sit during July and August. Our only recommendation has been to start the business of the Committee of the Whole with two witnesses. The committee will determine its agenda later on, after we have had two or three witnesses take part in the proceedings.

The Chairman: Does that answer your question, Senator Simard?

Senator Simard: More or less, Mr. Chairman.

The Chairman: As to the steering committee, the decision yesterday was to invite two witnesses, a government representative and another witness, Senator Forsey; after these testimonies a decision would be made. We are now at that stage.

Now it has been suggested today that Professor Beaudoin be invited. Any arguments on this question?

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough) mentioned the possibility of inviting one or two government spokesmen and perhaps even three witnesses.

Mr. Chairman, my suggestion is that the steering committee authorize you to discuss this possibility with the government, as well as the appearance of Professor Beaudoin as a witness. But in the meantime I would suggest that Senator Forsey be invited to participate. If I understand correctly, the position of Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough) is that we should start off with the government witnesses. So if it were possible to have one or two of the three witnesses, for instance Mr. Spector, the Deputy Minister of Justice and the Leader of the Government in the Senate, after that we might entertain the possibility of inviting Professor Beaudoin. But we must explore this possibility from the outset.

Senator Denis: Mr. Chairman, if we were to have two witnesses appear and since it has been suggested the proceedings might be televised, I would like to know whether the first witnesses will have the same advantage. The other witnesses who will appear later will have that advantage, whereas the testimony of the first witnesses will not be televised.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, it is only an experiment, for the final decision rests with the Senate. It is not a question of allowing TV cameras in the case of one witness and refusing them in the case of another.

It seems to me this is an excellent opportunity to study the impact of television in the Senate. My discussion with Senator Flynn was not to the effect that we should adopt the motion under Order Paper item No. 5 and then amend it later. We simply want to stand the motion under Order Paper item No. 5 so we may have an opportunity to try this experiment.

[English]

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I feel that we are probably unnecessarily confusing television and the meeting of the Committee of the Whole. The question really now before us is the procedure of this committee. Yesterday it was agreed among the steering committee that the government be the first witness. Senator Stewart has again expressed that desire today, and I would like to join him in that. I believe that the government should be given the opportunity to explain its position first.

Senator Frith: And so do I. That is what I said.

Senator Phillips: Senator Murray will be back on Thursday. May I suggest that there be a discussion at that time between Senator Murray and the chairman?

Senator Frith: Agreed. That is exactly what I suggested. We should explore that first.

[Translation]

The Chairman: Senator Simard.

Senator Simard: Mr. Chairman, I would like some clarification about a reply given by Senator Frith.

Did I understand correctly Senator Frith to say that the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole would begin by inviting two or three government representatives to appear? He then clarified his position by saying that, before deciding whether we should listen to Professor Beaudoin, we should hear the government representatives and later decide whether to wait fifteen days, three weeks or two months.

Mr. Chairman, with all due respect for the honourable senators opposite, I cannot understand the Liberal majority in this place. According to some reports, they ran the risk of embarrassing the leader of their own party, among other people by creating this committee. Did I just hear Senator Frith admit that his colleagues have no specific plan, even though some people are thinking about their holidays? In addition, some of the committees will not be in Ottawa, including the Committee on Fisheries, which will be away from July 5 to July 15.

We do not know whether we could be called back with twenty-four hours' notice. This seems to me a rather strange and unusual way of doing things. If the subject is important and if it is urgent for the Senate to sit in Committee of the Whole to examine this issue, it seems to me that the majority in this house should be able to tell us whether they want to proceed quickly, who the witnesses will be, how many there might be and what their general position is.

Are you now admitting, Senator Frith, that you have no specific plan, that you do not know where you are going and that we should believe the rumour that you may wait for the Joint Committee to submit its own report? I would like all this to be clear so that the Canadian people and the Senate know what to expect.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, today is the second time that Senator Simard has addressed me as though I were Leader of the Government in the Senate. That is very flattering. It is the second time he has asked about the position of the majority in the Senate. He is acting as though it were necessary for the Opposition to have a plan and to announce it. He is asking me what we, the majority, are going to do about this question.

What we are discussing now is simply the way to proceed. We are not discussing the policy or plans of the majority or the plans of the government, of Senator Simard or of Senator Molson. We are simply discussing how the committee will proceed and what the steering committee will decide. That is all. I have put certain suggestions to the steering committee. Senator Stewart and Senator Phillips have made other suggestions. I feel that it is not up to us, in the majority, or to the senators opposite to decide. As I understand it, we agree that it is now up to the steering committee to consider the suggestions the committee will make when it reports today.

Senator Simard: I then take it that there is no plan.

The Chairman: Are there any other comments? As I understand it, you are asking first, as suggested by Senator Phillips, that I speak to Senator Murray and try to get one, two or three spokesmen from the government, and then Senator Forsey and perhaps Professor Beaudoin.

Is it agreed? We shall therefore wait until Thursday and I shall speak with Senator Murray on his return.

However, there remains one question, that of television. If we indeed have our proceedings televised, there are certain physical matters to take care of here, and our staff must get ready. What do you want to do about it?

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, the possibility of having television on a temporary basis, as I suggested, is just that, a possibility, and the steering committee will have to make the decision.

Finally, if we are speaking about arranging for the presence of television cameras, this is also up to the steering committee. I think that we should put this question aside for now as we have not agreed on it. If, for instance, we arrange for a witness to appear without there being an agreement on the matter of television, the steering committee can still make arrangements.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I have one personal comment to make. We have heard constant reference to "the steering committee will decide." I have no objection to the steering committee making recommendations; that is indeed its function. I think the Committee of the Whole will decide. I wanted to get that point clear.

Senator Frith: Of course.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, we still have Order No. 5 on the order paper for Thursday. I think that is when television broadcasting should be dealt with.

The Chairman: Indeed, honourable senators, what I was doing was reporting what the steering committee recommended for approval of honourable senators. I expect that the steering committee will continue to proceed in that way.

Is there any other business before the committee?

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again.

The Chairman: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Denis, that the committee rise, report progress, and request leave to sit again. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which the Meech Lake accord and texts subsequently agreed to were referred, reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Third Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources (supplementary budget re examination of the production and use of natural gas in Canada), presented in the Senate on June 11, 1987.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the Third Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, being the budgetary requirement to comply with the procedural guidelines for the financial operation of Senate committees.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Fourth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources (supplementary budget re examination of the production and use of coal in Canada), presented in the Senate on June 11, 1987.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of the Fourth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, being a report to comply with the budgetary requirements of the procedural guidelines for the financial operation of Senate committees.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

CANADA-EUROPE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

VISIT OF DELEGATION TO FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY—
FIFTH REPORT PRINTED AS APPENDIX—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc rose, pursuant to notice of Thursday, February 12, 1987:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the visit of the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association delegation to the Federal Republic of Germany, from January 15 to 27, 1987.

He said: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I propose that the fifth report of the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association be printed as appendix to today's Hansard to enable honourable senators to read it and be in a position to debate it in the near future.

I would point out that the report was tabled in the House of Commons on Monday, February 16, 1987.

Senators Grafstein and Atkins who accompanied the delegation to Germany indicated to me that they would like to take part in the debate. Therefore I would adjourn the debate in my name so that these two senators and I, and others interested in this subject, might relate personal experiences concerning this trip.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Which association are you referring to?

Senator Leblanc (Saurel): I am talking about the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association.

(For text of report, see Appendix "E", p. 1369.)

On motion of Senator Leblanc (Saurel), debate adjourned.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY UNION

SEVENTY-SEVENTH CONFERENCE, MANAGUA, NICARAGUA

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell rose, pursuant to notice of Wednesday, May 13, 1987:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Seventy-Seventh Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Union, held in Managua, Nicaragua, from 27th April to 2nd May, 1987.

He said: Honourable senators, the opening ceremonies of the Seventy-Seventh Inter-Parliamentary Conference were held at the Olof Palme Conference Centre on April 27, 1987, with the participation of the President of the Republic of Nicaragua, Commander of the Revolution, Daniel Ortega Saavedra. During the ceremony, which was opened at 10 o'clock in the morning, the delegates heard Mr. Carlos Nunez Tellez, President of the National Assembly and of the Nicaraguan Inter-Parliamentary Group; Mr. Hans Stercken, President of the Inter-Parliamentary Council; and Commander Daniel Ortega Saavedra, President of the Republic of Nicaragua.

The national groups of 90 countries took part in the work of the session along with observers from the United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees; the International Labour Organization; the United Nations Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization; the World Health Organization; the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade; the United Nations Conference on Trade and Development; the Council of Europe and the Parliamentary Assembly of the Council of Europe; the Latin American Parliament; the Andean Parliament; the International Association of French-Speaking Parliamentarians; the Arab Inter-Parliamentary Union, the Union of African Parliaments; the Parliamentary Association for Euro-Arab Co-operation; the International Committee of the Red Cross; and the Palestine National Council.

There was a total of 710 delegates from the national groups, including 430 members of Parliament and 33 observers.

The Executive Committee of IPU held its 201st session in Managua on 24, 25 and 30 April, 1987, with the President of the Inter-Parliamentary Council, Mr. H. Stercken of the Federal Republic of Germany, in the Chair.

The executive gave considerable attention to the question of the commemoration of the Union's centenary in 1989. It took note of the latest information on events planned in the various member countries to mark that important event, and decided, in particular, to go ahead with the proposal from a leading journalist historian for the preparation of a book highlighting the main features of the Union's history. This undertaking will be under the close supervision of the president of the council. It also decided in favour of the publication of a brochure focussing particularly on the organization's more recent achievements.

It also authorized the Secretary General to organize, at the next conference, a meeting of an informal group, to be led by Mr. Claude Pepper, Congressman from the City of Miami, U.S.A., open to all those parliamentarians wishing to participate, to consider issues relating to the health and well-being of the elderly.

The council also recommended to the Inter-Parliamentary Union that Sudan be re-admitted as a member of the Union, which was agreed to by the Union. As a result, the Union is now composed of 108 national groups.

Other items on the agenda for discussion at the Seventy-Seventh Inter-Parliamentary Conference were the contribution of the Parliaments to the World Campaign for the holding of a peace conference in the Middle East; the implementation of the decisions of the United Nations Security Council on Lebanon; and support to the international efforts to stop the Iran-Iraq war and the consequences for peace in the area, in the Mediterranean basin, and in the world.

The discussion was led off by our own Senator Nathan Nurgitz who did an excellent job on behalf of Canada. He then became the rapporteur for the committee stage and reported back to the plenary session on the results of the drafting committee. Canada received excellent compliments on his contribution to this discussion. The draft resolution, as a whole, was adopted, with 832 votes in favour, 46 votes against, and 79 abstentions.

The next item on the agenda was the contribution of Parliaments to the achievement of fair international trade in all its aspects, including trade in agricultural products, the elimination of tariffs and other barriers, and a better understanding of the socio-economic impact of protectionism, in particular, on the developing countries. Mr. Ricardo Lopez, M.P., Mr. Marcel Tremblay, M.P., and Mr. Dan Heap, M.P., took active part in this discussion and had some amendments put forward to the drafting committee pertaining to Canada's interest in world trade.

During the debate on the political, economical and social situation of the world, I spoke on the topic of AIDS, trying to explain to the 90 countries present that they should spend more money on promoting education in this area with a view to stopping the spread of this serious disease. I also pointed out that in certain countries of Africa, unless something is done on a world-wide scale, 25 per cent of their populations could be wiped out by the year 1995.

The chairman, Mr. Benno Friesen, M.P., spoke on the political and economic situation of the world and Canada's participation therein.

The next item on the agenda was the contribution of Parliaments to the achievement of the aims of peace in Central America, which was covered by Mr. Warren Allmand, M.P., who made a great contribution on behalf of Canada's participation in Central America.

The next meeting of IPU will be held in Bangkok between October 12 and 17, 1987. One of the main items on the agenda for that meeting is the contribution of Parliaments to the respect, development and promotion of human rights; and to the respect for fundamental principles, treaties and obligations governing relations among nations in order to solve the problems of refugees and displaced persons. This item was put forward by Canada on the recommendation of Mr. Ostrom, M.P. It was supported by the Canadian Branch of IPU, then by the Twelve Plus Group nations, and, finally, by the whole Inter-Parliamentary Union in conferences assembled in Managua.

I would like to thank the members of the Inter-Parliamentary Union who participated in the conference at Managua, and especially Senator Bosa who participated in the conference of the Twelve Plus Group in Berlin. I would also like to thank the members who participated in the conference in Managua, Nicaragua, the president of the Canadian Branch, its members, as well as his staff and secretariat. Mr. Stephen Knowles and our adviser, Mrs. Barbara Reynolds, did an excellent job on behalf of Canada.

● (1600)

Honourable senators, I have a lot of documents that I would like to tell you about, but rather than having them printed in the Debates of the Senate I ask that they be tabled as the report of the Inter-Parliamentary Union and be kept as a record.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Documents tabled.

Senator Bonnell: Let me take this opportunity to thank and congratulate Senator Nurgitz on an excellent job, as well as Mr. Ricardo Lopez, M.P.; Mr. John Oostrom, M.P.; Mr. Marcel Tremblay, M.P.; the Honourable Warren Allmand, M.P.; and Mr. Dan Heap, M.P., who excelled themselves in supporting Canada's beliefs and views at this conference.

Let me also say that our Clerk, Mr. Charles Lussier, did an excellent job with their Clerks at the conference, and he should be congratulated as well. Also, Mr. Stephen Knowles and Barbara Reynolds, our secretary and our adviser, who also worked hard during the committee, should be congratulated.

I should also say that the ambassador who represents that area from Costa Rica, Ambassador Gooch, made every effort possible to see that the Canadian delegation was treated well in that country, along with Mr. G. J. Cooney, Georgette Denegri, John Wheatcroft, Emilio Sanchez and Ricardo Calvo.

Honourable senators, with those brief remarks on my part, I thank you for listening.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered as having been debated.

THE CONSTITUTION

MOTION TO AMEND THE CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. John M. Godfrey moved, pursuant to notice of Thursday, June 18, 1987:

That the Senate resolve that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation, issued by Her Excellency the Governor General, under the Great Seal of Canada, as follows:

PROCLAMATION AMENDING THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

Section 31(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867 is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

"(1) If, for two consecutive calendar years, he fails to give his attendance in the Senate for at least one-third of the sittings in each of those years."; and

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons to acquaint that House thereof and to invite them to join with this House in the aforementioned action.

He said: Honourable senators, you will notice that this is a constitutional amendment in which it is proposed to repeal section 31(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867. I shall, therefore, read that section to you. Section 31(1) of the Constitution Act, 1867 states:

[Senator Bonnell]

The Place of a Senator shall become vacant in any of the following cases:

(1) If for two consecutive Sessions of the Parliament he fails to give his Attendance in the Senate.

I remember personally becoming aware of that provision in the Constitution back in the 1930s, when I took a train to Ottawa one day and there was an elderly senator on board in a wheelchair, who was obviously incapacitated from a stroke. I was informed that he was taking his yearly visit to Ottawa to appear once in the Senate so that he could remain a senator.

I recall, after being appointed as a senator, visiting my son in Nova Scotia. He introduced me as a senator to a schoolgirl. She said, "The only thing that I know about the Senate is that you only have to turn up once every two years." That is all that her teacher had ever told her. In that fact she was wrong, because we only have to turn up once every two sessions. A session, as we know, can last for three years, as it did during the Trudeau government. So, during that period, you only had to turn up once every four years.

I recall sitting in the Senate one day some years ago when a senator who had been incapacitated for seven or eight years was wheeled in through the bar of the Senate. He stopped for not more than a minute, was wheeled out, and qualified for another two sessions. Recently, I am informed, the same thing happened with one of our present senators who is completely incapacitated.

This is not good enough. There is no way in which a senator—as long as he is capable of being brought in on a stretcher—can lose his seat in the Senate.

This amendment is for that purpose rather than for those senators who do not ordinarily turn up as often as they should. Those senators can, every two years under this amendment, turn up for one third of the sessions and keep their seats. We all know of some of those. No doubt they will make that extra effort every two years, cursing me, if this goes through, every time they have to come to Ottawa when they would not ordinarily have done so.

Honourable senators, I cannot see any possible reason for any objection to this motion.

I received an opinion from Bruce Carson of the Law and Government Division of the Research Branch of the Library of Parliament. The question of whether this should be proceeded with by way of resolution and a proclamation or by a bill was mentioned earlier by Senator Marchand. I will read to you from Mr. Carson's opinion. He said:

As this is an amendment which would only affect the conditions of tenure senators, it could be accomplished through the method prescribed by section 44 of the Constitution Act, 1982. That is, it need only be passed by the House of Commons and the Senate and does not need the concurrence of any of the provinces. This is an amendment which affects tenure only in an indirect way, and in very specific circumstances. It can be compared to the amendment to the retirement provisions in the Constitution relating to senators. This amendment, which changed the tenure of office for a senator from life to age 75, was brought into being in 1965 by the central Parliament without reference to the provinces. Therefore, it would seem that an amendment dealing with the terms of terminating that tenure would be within the competence of the federal Parliament to enact on its own.

I must confess that I did something that I tell all the young lawyers in my law firm never to do, namely, never to rely on someone else's legal opinion. When you get someone to do some research for you, you should always check up on it. It shows that I am getting old, because I accepted Mr. Carson's legal opinion without going any further. I can now see that there is a question as to whether or not this is the correct procedure, and whether this amendment should be dealt with by way of a bill rather than by a resolution. I am not in a position to go into that right now, but I would suggest that that can be studied later on and the best procedure decided upon.

I should point out that this is not an original idea of mine. Back in 1980 there was a report on certain aspects of the Canadian Constitution. It was called the Goldenberg-Lamontagne report—although Senator Goldenberg did not have anything to do with it, except for the fact that he was chairman of the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee. Senator Lamontagne was responsible for the first part of the report which, in effect, recommended a federal-provincial council. The second part dealt with a renewed Senate, and it reads at page 38:

Third, any senator who fails for two successive years to attend at least one-third of the sittings of the Senate in each of those two years should forfeit his or her seat. (This would replace the present section 31.1 of the British North America Act, under which the seat is forfeited if the senator fails to give any attendance whatever for two consecutive sessions.)

Senator Stanbury, on at least two occasions, gave speeches in which he said that we should take some action with respect to the recommendations of this report.

While I am on my feet, I would like to discuss other aspects of Senate reform. I would like first to refer to the question of a suspensive veto, which is also mentioned in this report. At page 39 of the report, it reads:

We feel for this purpose the present absolute veto power is not necessary; indeed, the very fact of its absoluteness makes the Senate reluctant to reject any bill, however bad, even temporarily. We believe that a six months' suspensive veto would give the Senate all the power it needs. The government, and the House of Commons and the country would be compelled to think again. The Senate would have enough time to put its case squarely before the public. If, when six months were up, the government and the House of Commons were so convinced of public support for the bill that they insisted on re-passing it in the House of Commons, then the Senate would have done its duty and could acquiesce with a clear conscience. It would be essential, of course, that the bill be re-introduced in the House of Commons and repassed there. A mere lapse of six months, after which the bill would come into effect without any reconsideration by the Commons, would destroy the whole purpose of the suspensive veto.

In 1972 the report of the joint committee, chaired by Senator Molgat and the Honourable Mark MacGuigan, recommended a suspensive veto of six months. They also said in their report that any period where Parliament is prorogued or dissolved shall not be counted in computing the six months.

Bill C-60, in 1978, recommended a 60-day suspensive veto, although its provisions would have allowed a period of up to 120 days between the original passage of a bill by the House of Commons and the date on which it would come into effect, despite the Senate veto. As we are all aware with respect to the Constitution Act of 1982, section 47(1) in an amendment to the Constitution provided for a suspensive veto of 180 days. In January 1984 the joint committee, chaired by Senator Molgat and the Honourable Paul Cosgrove, reported. They recommended a suspensive veto for a maximum of 120 sitting days, divided into two equal periods of 60 days. In practice, and depending on the time of year, the maximum length of delay would be between seven and nine months. The Senate would have no power to hold up appropriation bills, including the Main, Interim and Supplementary Estimates.

That report also contained a section on what reforms should be made now. I would like to read into the record what they say at page 37:

With the exception of constitutional amendments, the Senate's consent is required before any bill, including a money bill, can become law. This requirement is commonly called the Senate's absolute veto. We have already noted that the Senate has been increasingly unwilling to use that veto. Many people have suggested, however, that an appointed Senate would feel less inhibited about using a suspensive veto, and that if it did, senators would be able to play a more important and useful role in their review of legislation emanating from the House of Commons.

We agree that a suspensive veto would be a more suitable instrument in the hands of an appointed Senate than an absolute veto, and would probably be used. We also believe that the availability and occasional use of such a veto would help to facilitate the transition from an appointed Senate to an elected Senate, where a suspensive veto is likely to be used more readily.

The Senate's present absolute veto could not be converted to a suspensive one without a constitutional amendment involving the use of the general amending procedure, because such a change would affect the Senate's powers. However, it has been suggested to us that the Senate, without diminishing its constitutional powers, could adopt a procedure for the more flexible use of its veto, a procedure that would have the effect of making it suspensive.

This procedure could work in the following way. The debate on any bill in the Senate could be adjourned to a subsequent date on the motion of any senator, provided the motion was approved in the debate that followed. Such a procedure is already allowed under the Rules of the Senate. An adjournment of the debate would give notice to the government that the Senate wanted time to negotiate changes to the legislation. If the points at issue were resolved, the bill would be brought back for completion of debate and ultimate disposition. The Senate would, of course, have to approve the bill before it could become law.

This procedure would work best if everyone, in both houses of Parliament, understood the rules: that is, the circumstances in which the procedure would be invoked, the length of the delay for different kinds of bills (if the delay is not to be decided separately for each bill), and other relevant matters.

These rules could be incorporated in the existing Rules of the Senate or, with more formality, in a federal statute requiring the consent of both houses. Although a statute would not bind the Senate constitutionally, it would have the advantage of signifying that the procedure laid down was acceptable to both houses.

That points up the fact that we do not need a constitutional amendment if the majority, particularly on this side of the house, agreed that from now on we will operate on the basis that we only have a six months' suspensive veto. So, every time we amended a bill, the government could not rear up its head and say, "You have no right to block the will of the voters in the House of Commons." If we had previously said that, we would never hold up a bill for more than six months. In the meantime, negotiations could be carried on. In the case of some bills, if they are repassed immediately by the House of Commons, such as the gating bill, and if the Senate decides that its amendments are not that important, we would pass it right away. Other bills we might hold up for two or three months. A perfect example right now is Bill C-22, the pharmaceutical patents bill. It is no secret that that bill was brought in to appease the American government. If the Senate decided to bring in amendments to the bill, and announced beforehand that it would not hold up the bill for more than six months, the government could say to the American government, "Look, don't worry. The bill will pass in six months." In the meantime, if the free trade negotiations were to break down and there was no longer any point in appeasing the American government, our government could very well decide after the six-month period is up that they will withdraw the bill. So that is a very practical way in which a six-month suspensive veto could help.

Senator Roblin: I think you are dreaming in technicolour.

Senator Godfrey: While I am still on my feet—

[Senator Godfrey]

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh.

Senator Godfrey: I have made various other efforts, without a great deal of success, suggesting reforms in the Senate. I can recall that way back in March of 1982 I wrote a letter to Senator Perrault, the then Leader of the Government. The purpose of the letter was to raise five matters before a meeting of the chairmen of committees. It was finally considered at a meeting on Thursday, November 4. I will refer to the headlines from the notice of that meeting. The first item is pre-study of bills. At that time the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee was the only committee pre-studying bills, though occasionally other committees would conduct pre-studies, and I was advocating that we go into the whole question of pre-studying bills and do more of it. I can chalk that suggestion up as one that came to pass.

The second item is provincial government representation. I proposed a motion that when a Senate committee considered bills of particular interest to a particular province or any province, that province or any province should be invited to make representations before the committee. The committee decided not to adopt my formal resolution but to try the practice in an informal way. I withdrew the motion. It proved its usefulness for six or seven months, whereupon I re-introduced the motion. It passed, and has been operating as a principle of the Senate very successfully.

The third item on the agenda was a human rights question. Five years later, I still have a motion, though it passed a couple of years ago, before the Senate that a committee of the Senate—two years ago it was the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments—should look at all bills to see whether or not they offend the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Unfortunately, since the Regulations Committee was a joint committee, that motion had to be approved by the House of Commons. We still do not have that approval. On March 31 I introduced a new motion to the same effect. The debate is adjourned in Senator Nurgitz's name. He has said that he will go ahead with it this week. I hope that he does, as a special present to me before I retire at the end of the week. We have changed the motion in that it no longer refers to the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments but refers to the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee, so we do not need the approval of the House of Commons.

The next item is enabling clauses in bills, which we wanted for the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments. Again, we finally got that through two years ago, but the House of Commons did not do anything about it. However, if we pass it again, and if the Leader of the Government in the Senate were to be more aggressive, I am sure that the House of Commons would agree to it.

Finally, I suggest that we should have regular meetings of committee chairmen to discuss the investigative work of committees and whether or not we should recommend investigations in certain areas. Up to that time—and I think it is still true—practically every investigative committee is inspired by one senator. The consensus comes when one senator gets other senators to agree to the setting up of a committee and to serve on that committee. Honourable senators, if the two motions I have referred to go through this week, I am not batting too badly on my five suggestions for reform.

However, honourable senators, on the broad question of reform of the Senate, I must tell you that I was on a panel at a meeting of the Canadian Learned Society in Hamilton a couple of weeks ago. Professor C.E.S. Franks was the chairman of that panel, and he supplied me with a paper which he had written in April and revised in May of 1987. It is entitled: "At the Still Point of the Turning World: The Canadian Senate in an Age of Reform." This paper is very favourable to the Canadian Senate. I think it is probably one of the most favourable papers that I have read. To give you a taste of it, I will read a paragraph from it. It says, on page 7:

These investigations are usually of a higher standard than those by committees of the House of Commons. Reasons for the differences include: first, many extremely able and experienced Canadians sit in the Senate and contribute to this investigative work; second, investigations by the Senate are usually non-partisan; third, Senate investigations do not suffer from excessive exposure in the media; fourth, senators have the time and leisure to conduct diligent research and exhaustive analysis; and fifth, investigators can work on for many years, immune from the vagaries and demands of the electoral process. The work procedures of Senate committees are far better than those of the House, and ensure that witnesses are given the time to present their case, and are questioned carefully. Competence, freedom from competing demands on energy, low partisanship, and an absence of pressures of time and fears about re-election, are the keys to successful Senate investigations.

However, on page 14—and this is really why I am mentioning this—he says:

Nevertheless, in other areas where it was expected to be useful,—

And he is still talking about the Senate:

—especially in representing the interests of the provinces and regions, the defence of minorities, and the protection of human rights, its record has not been impressive.

At page 15, he says:

The most interesting thing about these proposals is that they have not changed for several generations:

Here he is referring to proposals for reform of the Senate.

—like the weather, everybody talks about Senate reform but nobody does anything about it. The Senate has undergone fewer reforms than the Commons. For a body with such obvious faults this stability is somewhat surprising. The Senate continues unchanged . . .

Honourable senators, at this stage I must say I have often wondered why does it always have to be me? When the House of Commons brought in its reforms, one would have thought that some of our leaders would have looked at them and wondered how they might apply to the Senate, and, if so, that perhaps we should adopt some of them. However, nothing happened until I started bringing in motions to adopt in the Senate some of the House of Commons reforms. I think I only batted about 300 on the various proposals I made that were looked at by the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders.

I cannot tell you how delighted I was when Senator Marchand got up today and presented his bill on a constitutional reform of the Senate, even though it gave me some qualms that my motions may not be in order. Really, as he says, this provision that a senator must own $4,000 worth of real estate is just ridiculous in this day and age; yet, in all these years, no one has done anything about it until Senator Marchand got up today and moved first reading of his bill.

Honourable senators, as I am retiring—and Thursday will be my last day—all I am pleading for is that there be someone else around to carry on in my absence my proposals for reform of the Senate and that they will not die.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Honourable senators, I am honoured to move the adjournment of this debate which may be the last raised by our distinguished and passionate colleague.

[English]

POINT OF ORDER

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, before the debate is adjourned, perhaps we have a point of order that should be looked at. The Constitution, I think, deals with questions of the power, method of selection and numbers of senators. However, I think there is a good case to be made that an amendment of this sort could be handled by a bill rather than a constitutional amendment, which would invoke the interest of the provinces. If we had a resolution that passed, that would then automatically call in provincial interest in the matter, and that might be exceedingly difficult to handle.

However, if it is merely a bill, then the two houses of the federal Parliament can settle the matter. Therefore, I request that some study be made of the matter to see whether we can help Senator Godfrey.

Hon. John M. Godfrey: I certainly agree. Having now read section 44 for the first time and the wording of other sections, I have doubts as to whether this is the proper procedure. I think we certainly should get an opinion from the Clerk before anything else is done. Then when that opinion is received, I will rely on Senator Hébert, in my absence, to propose, if necessary, a bill to regularize the procedure. It will be a very simple bill, and I am sure it can be prepared for Senator Hébert by the Law Clerk.

On motion of Senator Hébert, debate adjourned.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-22

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, as chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Subject Matter of Bill C-22, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the third report in respect of the subject matter of the bill. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix "F", p. 1375.)

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, this report is approximately 26 pages in length and is in both official languages, as I have said. I intend to make a two-hour speech with respect to this report, which I cannot do this afternoon since the hour is late. However, I would be grateful if the Senate would grant me permission to say a few words about the report this afternoon, and then I will adjourn the debate until Thursday next.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Senator Roblin: I have already refused leave on this matter.

Senator Frith: Senator Bonnell is asking for a little time to explain, but not to make a speech today. Perhaps his explanation will help you in your consideration of the report.

Senator Roblin: Senator Bonnell is so persuasive, perhaps I will listen.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, do I have your leave?

Senator Frith: Yes, you have leave. Go ahead.

Senator Roblin: Perhaps there should be a time limit on this.

Senator Bonnell: I can assure the honourable senator I will be finished by 5.30 this afternoon.

Senator Roblin: You had better get started, then!

● (1630)

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, let me say first that as I travelled across this beautiful country of Canada, I saw not only the magnitude of the country, I saw the magnitude of the problem of Bill C-22. I also saw the magnitude of the many other problems facing us as Canadians. I would like to go on about that, but I will keep specifically to this report.

[Senator Godfrey.]

Basically, we heard from many people that the reason this bill was presented to the House of Commons and to the government was because the Americans wanted a level ball-field for free trade.

Senator Phillips: Come on!

Senator Bonnell: That is what we heard. I did not say it was true. Senator Phillips must believe it is true, because he said, "Come on."

Senator Phillips: I am sure you said that was the reason.

Senator Bonnell: No, I said we heard from many witnesses that that was the reason.

We were also informed that before 1969 Canadian drug prices were among the highest in the world. The government of the day set up three commissions to look into this. Each of those commissions recognized that the price of drugs was high. Those three commissions were the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, the Hall Commission and the Harley Commission. After hearing from these commissions, the Liberal government of the day passed the Patent Act of 1969 allowing for compulsory licensing so that generic drugs could be made in Canada. This started the establishment of a Canadian drug manufacturing industry in this country which grew much faster than the multinationals were growing in the United States or had ever grown in Canada before.

The passage of the changed Patent Act at that time allowed for the generic drug companies to be established in Canada, and allowed drug prices to become among the lowest in the industrial world so that Canadians could benefit from a $311 million savings annually in drug costs, according to the Eastman report in 1983.

It was the view of the Consumers' Association of Canada that pharmaceuticals constituted part of the health care field, along with medicare and hospitalization. They stated that Canada has decided that health care should not be left to the private sector. Therefore, the drug industry should have a high degree of government involvement. They also suggested that the Canadian model of compulsory licensing is well thought of in the world, and even some Congressmen in the United States are trying to copy the Canadian plan, as are some other countries in the free world. It has been suggested by others that it is the fear of other nations copying the Canadian plan, which is considered to be one of the best in the world, that really worries the American government. It was also the view of the Consumers' Association that the 10 per cent research goal should be enshrined within this legislation.

A Mr. D.A. Hill suggested to the committee that Bill C-22, which deals with the patent system in general, will affect far more patents than those provisions dealing specifically with the drug industry. Under this new Patent Act, Canada is moving from a first-to-invent system of patents to a first-to-file system of patents. This change in the act creates unnecessary confusion, and he suggested that Bill C-22 may make Canada a patent infringement haven. There were suggestions that the bill does not grant equal national treatment and, thus, may contravene international accords. He suggested the part dealing with general patent provisions should receive far more scrutiny.

The Canadian Labour Congress agrees that the changes to the Patent Act made by the Liberal government in 1969 gave Canada some of the lowest drug prices in the world. It was suggested that the drug industry fears that the Canadian model is liable to become a pattern for the rest of the world, and is consequently pressuring the government to pass Bill C-22. The Canadian Labour Congress expressed the view that Canada has the government-controlled universal medicare and hospitalization scheme and it also should control drug prices and have a drug control scheme. They further believe that drug prices would rise substantially if Bill C-22 is passed, and they further believe that the bill has been forced upon Canada as a pre-condition for the free trade negotiations with the United States in order to give a level ballfield. The CLC recommends that the bill be withdrawn.

Dr. Harry Eastman, who has already been appointed as chairman of the drug prices review board and has agreed to accept this position, says that all countries intervene in some way in the drug industry. He further suggested that he preferred the approaches taken in his own report, but he views Bill C-22 as acceptable.

On balance, most of those who appeared before the committee felt that the costs of the bill exceeded any benefits it might produce. The 1969 changes to the Patent Act were clearly of great benefit to the health care system provided for Canadians, saving individuals, taxpayers, insurance companies and hospitals hundreds of millions of dollars per year. In fact, the benefits of compulsory licensing and the availability of generic equivalents are considered to be so great and so obvious that many witnesses questioned the motivation for introducing such legislation in the first place. To many, this bill represents clear evidence of the external pressure brought to bear on the federal government by the United States in the advent of the free trade negotiations.

This bill, according to many, will threaten the $211 million in annual savings estimated by the Eastman report. It will threaten the loss of the $14 million saved by Manitobans in 1986, and it will significantly reduce the savings enjoyed by Ontario hospitals which amounted to $12 million in 1983. It could threaten the viability of the Ontario Drug Benefit Plan, costing that province possibly $1 billion over the next ten years.

Most Canadians, especially seniors, are members of drug reimbursement plans. This does not mean that they are necessarily shielded from any price increases. They must still pay part of their drug bills, and provincial governments are already reducing the coverage of their plans in the face of fiscal restraint. Bill C-22 will increase the pressure for such co-insurance. There is already evidence that the privately run drug reimbursement plans are increasing premium requirements, and this will likely increase in the future.

The bill will increase the period of exclusivity enjoyed by brand-name drugs. It is this delay in the introduction of generic equivalents which prevents drug prices from falling as rapidly as otherwise would be the case. Certain new drugs are proving to be extremely popular, and the delay in introducing their generic counterparts will result in millions of dollars in higher drug expenditures.

In exchange for these higher costs, Canadians are to benefit from the increase in research and development activity promised by the innovative firms and the creation of a drug prices review board which is to ensure reasonable prices for all drugs in Canada.

The medical and pharmacological research community supported this bill vigorously on the grounds that more research activity in Canada was needed to provide employment opportunities to Canadians, and to ensure that new medical information and treatment are readily available here. The bill was cited by these groups as a positive contribution to the Canadian health care scheme.

There were few who challenged the need for more Canadian medical and pharmacological research, but many questioned the usefulness of this bill in achieving those goals. The fact that the bill offers no guarantees of added research activity worried many. Others thought that the bill and the increased levels of exclusivity were far too high a price to pay for increased research. An alternative, which was endorsed by a wide range of opponents to Bill C-22, was the implementation of the recommendations contained in the Eastman report.

The creation of a prices review board was also of little comfort to the majority of witnesses opposing this bill. They noted that compulsory licensing was itself the most effective means of ensuring fair pricing, and that there really would be no need for such a regulatory board if Bill C-22 were never to be brought into force.

This board was seen as a powerless body when it comes to controlling prices set by multinational drug companies. The board will lack resources, financial and legislative, to control new drug prices. It is these new drugs which will account for the bulk of any future pharmaceutical market. The past Canadian experience with pricing boards and the international experience with drug pricing bodies all point to the impotence of such a body.

Honourable senators, I could go on for a long time, but I would like to adjourn this debate and to continue it at the next sitting of the Senate. I would inform senators that most of the members of this committee do not support the bill. But we did not at this stage recommend any amendments, nor did we recommend that the bill not be passed, because we were only doing a pre-study. We could not amend what we did not have, first, and, second, we thought that we could not very well agree to accept it because we could not reach consensus. We leave it with honourable senators and, on second reading, we ask that they do not proceed until they have at least studied this report. That is why I wanted to present it today, before second reading was completed. In that way senators will have an opportunity to study the report tomorrow and to continue with the debate on second reading on Thursday.

On motion of Senator Bonnell, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned until Thursday, June 25, 1987, at 2 p.m.

THE ESTIMATES, 1987-88

INTERIM REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE

TUESDAY, June 23, 1987

The Standing Senate Committee on National Finance has the honour to present its

TWELFTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which the expenditures proposed by the Estimates for the fiscal year ending 31 March, 1988 were referred, examined the said Estimates and presents, in obedience to the Order of Reference of March 10, 1987, an interim report as follows:

INTRODUCTION

On May 28, 1987, this Committee tabled its Eleventh Report the subject of which was the Estimates of the Government of Canada, 1987-88. Following tradition the Committee had used this opportunity to examine the overall fiscal plan of the government, as illustrated in Part I of these Estimates. The Committee also examined the extent to which the government has responded to recommendations it made in previous reports.

In this report, the Committee wishes to draw the attention of the Senate to those recommendations it has made during the 33rd Parliament, with respect to the form and use of estimates and with respect to the Financial Administration Act. It also wishes to draw attention to the responsiveness of Treasury Board.

A. THE ESTIMATES

First Session, Tenth Report (November 20, 1985)

During its examination of Supplementary Estimates (B), 1985-86, the Committee took the opportunity to question Treasury Board about the contradictory statements to be found between Parts II and III of the Main Estimates. The Committee was informed that while the data in Part II are consistent with that found in Part III, there are no assurances that the respective texts are consistent. While Treasury Board is responsible for the text in Part II, departments are responsible for the texts in Part III. The Committee stated:

Because Part IIIs are a relatively recent innovation and, as indicated by Mr. Manion, are far from perfect, alternative ways have to be found to update information for parliamentarians without their having to sleuth it out. Accordingly, some members of the Committee felt that the Treasury Board might look into the feasibility of making available to parliament...Treasury Board decisions affecting funding allocations, along with a brief explanation. (p. 25:5-6)

Treasury Board officials consulted with the Chairman of the Committee and with Committee staff to determine how the information needs of the Committee could best be met. Treasury Board now provides the Committee with a list of all items included in supplementary estimates which materially differ from information provided in the Estimates Part III. This information is included with the reports of the Committee on all supplementary estimates, where relevant.

Second Session, Third Report (December 16, 1986)

While reviewing Supplementary Estimates (A), 1986-87, the Committee scrutinized Treasury Board's Vote 5. This vote is used to supplement other votes for paylists and to cover unforeseen expenses. The Committee noted some ambiguity in the use of this allotment and a definite lack of guidelines. The Committee stated:

In the proposed Schedule to the Appropriations Bill presented in the 1986-87 Estimates, Part II, the description of Vote 5 contains no reference to "urgent" expenditures. According to the Part II, this vote is to be used, in part, "to provide for miscellaneous minor and unforeseen expenses". In the Committee's view, there is a difference between "unforeseen" expenses and "urgent" expenses. Therefore we recommend that Treasury Board examine the use of Vote 5, clarify its purpose, and redraft Parts II and III of future Estimates to insure consistency between them. (p. 1:8)

The Treasury Board Secretariat is completing a thorough review of TB Vote 5, its historical use, legal opinions received over the years, and practices in other jurisdictions. In the meantime the 1987-88 Main Estimates were drafted in such a manner as to ensure that descriptive sections of Parts II and III are consistent with the vote wording. The Committee also notes that Treasury Board has agreed to provide to the Committee its analysis on the use of Vote 5 in the fall of this year.

Second session, Sixth Report (March 24, 1987)

When one dollar votes are listed in supplementary estimates, very frequently they are used to transfer money from one vote to another. For example, on page 26 of Supplementary Estimates (C), 1986-87, the Department of Employment and Immigration sought authority to transfer $2 million from vote 10 to vote 20c. Previous estimates for vote 20c showed $99.7 million. Once this request was approved, vote 20c contained $101.7 million. Yet, Supplementary Estimates (C) showed vote 20c increasing by one dollar but with no corresponding decrease in vote 10 of $2 million. The Committee stated:

While the Committee is aware that vote transfers do not increase the expenditures of a department as a whole, they do reflect a divergence in the way money has been appropriated to that department. The Committee concluded that information on vote transfers, showing the amount of increase and decrease for each vote, should be displayed clearly in the table for each department and in the summary tables. (p. 4:6)

Treasury Board has agreed that there is confusion generated by the form used for vote transfers in supplementary estimates. Officials have indicated that a proposed new format for supplementary estimates is being developed. A "first mock-up" is expected shortly. Treasury Board will consult with the Committee before the new form is finalized in time for introduction with the first supplementary estimates for 1988-89.

B. THE FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT (FAA)

First Session, Fourteenth Report (March 19, 1986)

In reviewing Supplementary Estimates (C), 1985-86, the Committee learned that there is a difference between the forgiveness of a debt and the write-off of a debt; forgiveness eliminates the debt from the Public Accounts and removes any further obligation of the debtor to Her Majesty. Writing-off a debt, while eliminating it from the Public Accounts, has the effect of making the loan inactive, but "does not affect any right of Her Majesty to collect or recover the debt, obligation or claim" (FAA, 18(4)). The Committee further learned that through an appropriations act, forgiveness of a financial obligation to Her Majesty applies only to debts owed by Crown Corporations. There is no provision under the Act whereby debts owed by individuals or corporations, which have become uncollectible, may be forgiven.

The Committee concluded:

...that under the principle of equity, individuals and private corporations should have the same rights as Crown corporations with regard to write-off or forgiveness of debts and that the government should consider such a change when the Financial Administration Act comes under legislative review. (p. 44:8)

When he appeared before the Committee on Wednesday, April 23, 1986, the President of the Treasury Board stated that the recommendation had been favourably noted and that Treasury Board was trying to move along with the specific recommendations for the next legislative review. The appropriate changes to the FAA have been drafted, and the changes will be introduced as soon as practical within the current legislative calendar.

CONCLUSIONS

The Committee intends to continue in the fall to monitor its recommendations and the progress of Treasury Board. Also, the Committee plans to follow-up its investigations in a number of areas such as the role and use of Governor General's warrants, comprehensive auditing and the Canadian budgetary process.

Respectfully submitted,

SHIPPING CONFERENCES EXEMPTION

REPORT OF TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-21

TUESDAY, June 23, 1987

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications has the honour to present its

FIFTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of Bill C-21, Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1986 has in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, November 27, 1986 proceeded with that study and now presents the following interim report:

Your Committee has held two in camera meetings and eight public meetings. It has also received written briefs, including one from the province of Alberta.

Bill C-21, it will be remembered, would provide, as does The Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979 which it would replace, a limited exemption from the Competition Act to shipping conferences operating in Canada. Shipping conferences would enjoy such an exemption only if they abide by a certain number of conditions set out in Bill C-21. In this regard, it must be noted that Bill C-21 would introduce some changes to the existing legislation; those changes are aimed at increasing competition in the ocean shipping trade.

It is fair to summarize the stand of most shippers as being that shipping conferences should be deprived of their exemption from the Competition Act; but they acknowledge that this is most likely not to be the case and therefore urge that Bill C-21, with its new features designed to enhance competition, becomes law as drafted when tabled in the House of Commons for first reading. Conferences, on the other hand, have made known to your Committee that the status quo, that is to say the existing legislation, without any changes, should continue to govern the ocean shipping trade, would be their first choice; but they also acknowledge that this again is most likely not to be the case and, as a consequence, have offered some proposals of amendments to Bill C-21 as drafted when tabled in the House of Commons for first reading. Finally, officials of the Department of Transport who have testified before your Committee stated that the Department is seeking the "right balance".

Your Committee notes that the Legislative Committee of the House of Commons on Bill C-21, which has heard almost the same witnesses, has agreed to amend certain clauses of the Bill and has yet to make a decision on other proposed amendments to two controversial clauses. Your Committee has decided to see how those controversial clauses would be dealt with by the Legislative Committee before tabling a final report. However, we would like to draw attention to a technical point upon which we will take action if it is not otherwise disposed of.

The technical point to which your Committee wants to draw attention has to do with the inconsistency of the terms used in relation to conduct not allowed under Bill C-21. Clause 5(1)(a) of Bill C-21 states that the exemption conferences would enjoy from the Competition Act would not apply if any party to a conference agreement conspires, combines, agrees or arranges with any other party to the agreement "to use a vessel for the purpose of preventing or lessening, "unduly", competition in the transport of goods by an ocean carrier that is not a party to that agreement". Clause 14(1) of the Bill provides for a mechanism of investigation of complaints by the Canadian Transport Commission whereby any person who has reason to believe that any conference or interconference agreement, or any practice of a conference or a member thereof "has, or is likely to have, by a reduction in competition, the effect of producing an "unreasonable" reduction in transportation service or an "unreasonable" increase in transportation costs [...] may file a complaint (see also clause 14(2), where again the term unreasonable is used). In the French version of Bill C-21, both the terms "unduly" and "unreasonable" are rendered by the terms "abusivement" and "abusif". Your Committee thinks that this inconsistency has to be remedied so that interpretation problems will be avoided should Bill C-21 become law.

In order to determine what terms should be used, your Committee compared those used in Bill C-21 and in the Competition Act, given the fact that the former offers an exemption from the latter to conferences operating in Canada. Section 29 of the Competition Act, which has been part of it for many decades now, uses the terms "unduly" in its English version and "indûment" in its French version. Furthermore, when Parliament, in 1986, amended section 35(5)(c) of the Competition Act, it has also used the terms "unduly" and "indûment" (see S.C. 1986, c. 26). The solution, in the opinion of your Committee, is to follow what Parliament has done so far. Thus, in the English version of clause 14 of Bill C-21, the word "unreasonable" should be replaced by the word "unduly"; in the French version of clause 5(1), the adverb "abusivement" should be replaced by "indûment"; and in the French version of clause 14, the adjective "abusive" should be replaced by "indue".

Respectfully submitted,

CANAGREX DISSOLUTION

REPORT OF AGRICULTURE AND FORESTRY COMMITTEE
ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-2

TUESDAY, June 23, 1987

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of the Bill C-2, An Act to dissolve Canagrex and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, October 30, 1986, examined the subject-matter of the said Bill and now reports with the following observations:

The Corporation of Canagrex has been dormant since 1984. Bill C-2 seeks to wind up the affairs of the corporation and to dissolve its statutory framework.

The Committee is aware that the concept of Canagrex was hotly debated within the agricultural community and that there were strong arguments on both sides of the issue. No one disputes the need for agricultural export assistance. Export assistance is, if anything, more crucial now to the viability of many Canadian agricultural commodities than even 3 years ago.

During the course of its hearings on the subject-matter of the Bill C-2 the Committee heard evidence from Agriculture Canada, the Department of External Affairs (Trade) and the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion. In each case witnesses told the Committee that each department was working to develop agricultural trade, assistance initiatives. It appears to the Committee that these initiatives closely parallel those which Canagrex itself was created to provide. These include: providing market identification and intelligence; providing promotional and informational services; providing loans and guarantees; and providing grants and contributions to help accelerate product development and promotion.

The Committee reports the subject-matter of the Bill C-2, An Act to Dissolve Canagrex without amendment. In doing so it notes that the corporation has been dormant for nearly three years and as a statutory shell currently serves no purpose. The Committee does urge the government to carefully examine the elements of the Canagrex mandate and to ensure that those which could be of benefit to the Canadian farmer are implemented under the mandate of the appropriate departments.

Respectfully submitted,

DOME PETROLEUM LIMITED

PROPOSED SALE — REPORT OF ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE

TUESDAY, June 23, 1987

The Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources has the honour to present its

FIFTH REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized to study and report upon the proposed sale of Dome Petroleum Limited with particular reference to the impact of the sale on Canada, or any matter relating thereto, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of 12th May, 1987, proceeded to that inquiry and now presents an interim report.

The Committee is concerned about various aspects of the Amoco/Dome transaction.

Dome Petroleum, with the encouragement of the Canadian Government and the support of the banks, succeeded in assembling a massive portfolio of assets. Its wholly-owned subsidiaries include Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas Limited, Musketeer Energy Ltd., Provo Gas Producers Limited, Dome Energy Limited and Dome Investments Limited. Dome Petroleum also holds a 42.1% interest in ENCOR Energy Corporation and a 21.5% interest in Dome Mines Limited (which in turn owns 19.5% of Dome Petroleum). As operator and part-owner of the integrated NGL System, the Alberta Ethane Gathering System and the Cochin Pipeline System, Dome Petroleum has established the largest marketing position in Canada for natural gas liquids. The company ranks as Canada's second largest natural gas producer, third largest oil and gas liquids producer, and fourth largest sulphur producer.

As a company constituted in Canada, operating in the Canadian petroleum industry, and run — as far as the Committee can ascertain — by Canadian management, Dome Petroleum raised no public policy problem as long as the company remained a viable business concern. The problem now facing Canadian policymakers arises from the failure of what all had hoped and intended would remain a commercial, private sector undertaking.

The fact that such a large segment of Canada's oil and natural gas reserves and production is now up for acquisition makes the sale of Dome a matter of national interest. Based on year-end 1985 operating statistics, a merged Amoco/Dome operation would be the largest oil and gas producer in Canada, the second largest landholder in Canada and the largest landholder in Western Canada, the largest holder of natural gas reserves, and the fourth largest holder of oil and gas liquids reserves. The merger of Dome with any of the three bidders — Amoco Canada, Imperial Oil or TransCanada PipeLines — would result in a high concentration of assets and market power in Canada's petroleum industry.

The Committee does not take lightly the prospect that such a considerable influence over Canada's energy security and economy may come to lie outside the country. Dome testified that it is approximately 27% owned by Canadian investors; Amoco Canada is a wholly-owned subsidiary of its U.S. parent, Amoco Corporation.

The Committee has reservations about the process which resulted in the Amoco/Dome Agreement. The use of confidentiality agreements, although not abnormal, has impeded the Committee's inquiry into the implications of the transaction. The Committee would have much more confidence in assessing the case presented by Dome and Amoco if the other purchase offers had been disclosed.

If the bids of Imperial Oil and TransCanada PipeLines were clearly inferior, the disclosure of these bids by Dome would help remove any doubt that Amoco's bid was the best offer.

The "national interest" is the primary concern of this Committee. In the Dome case, this includes such issues as Canadianization, ownership and control, the reinvestment of cash flow in Canada, exploration and development activity, security of supply and employment. Especially during this period of weakness in Western Canada's economy, maintaining employment and creating jobs are priorities for Alberta and the North.

The Committee acknowledges the benefits to Canadians which might arise from the Amoco Canada/Dome Petroleum Arrangement Agreement with respect to employment, terms of payment to service companies and suppliers, the removal of obstacles to joint venture spending in the industry, the possibility that northern petroleum development will be expedited, and the full payment of outstanding Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax.

Amoco Canada has undertaken that "all available cash flow for the next five years will be dedicated to capital expenditures on the Amoco/Dome properties and to servicing the financial obligations of the Dome acquisition". There is no commitment to reinvest through the longer term, when petroleum prices and profits are expected to rise.

The Committee is unclear as to what amount of capital is actually going to be injected into exploration and development. Because the funds kept in Canada will also be used to service the debt resulting from the acquisition, it is not evident to what extent Amoco will increase exploration and development activity.

The assertion made by Amoco Canada in testimony that it is the logical purchaser because it owns many properties jointly with Dome is not unique to Amoco. The same claim has been made by TransCanada PipeLines.

The Committee is disappointed that an Amoco/Dome merger would reduce the percentage of Canadian ownership and control in Canada's petroleum industry, setting back the progress made in Canadianizing this sector, a policy objective of the present and previous governments.

The Committee supports the stated intention of Amoco Canada to sell a minority interest to Canadians. However, this initiative seems unlikely to have much effect on where the basic management decisions are made.

The Committee regrets that TransCanada PipeLines and Imperial Oil declined to appear before it. The Committee is not prepared to comment on the interests of these companies without their testimony.

There appear to be four plausible outcomes of Dome's present situation:

- The Amoco transaction may be consummated, subject to approval by Investment Canada, creditors and other interested parties.
- Dome's creditors may reject the agreement, and receivership may follow.
- Dome may be able to negotiate yet another debt rescheduling with its creditors, prolonging the status quo.

- Other bidders may enter the field with different offers, particularly if the Amoco offer is rejected.

The Committee agrees that the operations of Dome Petroleum should remain a going concern, under new ownership.

The Committee is not satisfied with the process by which Amoco's bid was selected. There is no basis for deciding if the Amoco Canada/Dome Petroleum Arrangement Agreement serves the best interests of the country. The Government should request that Dome Petroleum be released from the "no shop" and "lock-up" provisions in the Amoco/Dome Agreement, and that Dome remove restrictions preventing bidders from publicizing their offers. This would allow Dome to invite and facilitate new bids through an open and irreproachable process.

A dissenting opinion was expressed with respect to the preceding paragraph.

Because the outcome of the proposed transaction may be materially affected as the various deadlines pertaining to the Amoco Canada/Dome Petroleum Arrangement Agreement are reached, your Committee will request an extension of its final reporting date.

The visit was organized to allow Canadian parliamentarians the opportunity to study Germany's political system, in particular, the organization and running of the election campaign, the issues being debated and the role of the political foundations of each party.

Prior to departure the delegates received a detailed briefing from the staff of the Department of External Affairs in Ottawa, including Mr. Peter Walker, Director General of the Western Europe I Relations; Mr. Richard Looye, Desk Officer for the Federal Republic of Germany, and Mr. Chuck Larabie, Desk Officer for Western Europe Trade Development. Their briefings for the delegates included a review of current bilateral relations between Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany, and a general overview of the current election issues. Professor Wilfried von Bredow, Visiting Professor of Political Science Massey College, University of Toronto attended the luncheon to brief the delegates on the complexities of the German Electoral System. He answered several detailed questions regarding the dual vote ballot and the differences between the direct election of a candidate and the party's list or second vote.

Transport to Germany was organized by the Department of National Defence with a departure from Ottawa for Lahr on Thursday evening, January 15. On arrival at the Canadian Armed Forces Bases Lahr, the delegation was welcomed by Brigadier-General J.E.P. Lalonde, Commander, 4th Canadian Mechanized Brigade Group and Brigadier-General G. Scott Clements, Commander, 1st Canadian Air Group. Later that afternoon, the delegates toured the base and were shown all aspects of the work of the Canadian Armed Forces in Europe, including a Leopard Tank demonstration, the field hospital capabilities, helicopter reconnaissance and a demonstration of the new CF-18. The following morning, an indepth intensive briefing on the role of the Canadian Armed Forces in Europe and on the current terrorist threat assessment to our personnel and equipment was given to delegates by members of the Command Staff and Intelligence Branches.

The delegation then travelled by bus to Bonn where they were welcomed by Dr. Gunther Bergmann, Head of the International Relations Section of the Administration of the German Bundestag.

Sunday, January 18, the delegation was briefed by Ambassador Donald McPhail and several members of the Canadian Embassy staff on the election issues and current problem areas in the Canada-FRG bilateral relations.

Monday, January 19, the delegation met with Dr. Gerhard Reichle, Deputy Managing Director of the Friedrich-Naumann Foundation which is attached to the Free Democratic Party (FDP). Dr. Reichle explained the role of the foundations in German political life, emphasizing that they are not entitled to participate directly in any political activities but rather play a role in educating the public on political matters.

The concept of setting up political foundations was initiated following the Second World War as an attempt to educate the population on political matters in order to avoid a repeat of the situation which had brought the National Socialists and Hitler into power in the early 1930s.

He explained that, in addition to running seminars for the general public and interested persons, the foundation has taken on the role of trying to provide an educational role in developing countries or countries which are in the process of developing a democratic form of government. This came as a direct result of the federal government's decision in the 1960s to direct funds for Third World Development through non-governmental organizations (NGOs).

In the case of the Naumann Foundation, the efforts were also directed towards encouraging communication and co-operation between Liberal parties around the World, a reflection of its close ties to the FDP. This usually takes the form of international conferences and seminars to discuss current policy trends among Liberal parties around the world.

During the discussions, Dr. Burkhard Hirsch, an FDP member of the Bundestag arrived to meet the delegates and talk about the current election campaign. In view of the very busy campaign schedule, Dr. Hirsch's presence was greatly appreciated by the delegates.

Discussions covered the real and the perceived role of the foundations in regard to direct political activities. Although the foundations do not directly work for a party, an examination of the Board of Directors for each, indicates that at least one prominent politician from the respective party sits on its governing body.

Regarding the funding of the foundation, Dr. Reichle informed the delegates that their budget for 1987 was 60 million Deutsch Marks, of which 99 per cent would come from public funds. The amount of funds distributed to each of the party foundations was determined by a formula dividing the total amount available by the percentage of the vote received by the various political parties. The distribution will likely change based on the January 25th election results.

The Friedrich Naumann Foundation, in addition, to its headquarters in Königswinter, operates regional offices in the various Lander or states of the country.

This meeting was followed by a meeting with one of the chief election organizers for the Free Democratic Party, Mr. Klaus Pfnorr, who received the delegates in his office at the Party Headquarters. Mr. Pfnorr described the voting system in use in the Federal Republic of Germany which involves a two vote ballot. The first vote is for the candidate in the riding, and the second is a vote for the party. In the case of the FDP, the majority of their seats in the Bundestag are a result of the second vote or party vote, rather than as a result of the direct vote. The second vote or party vote is called the Land List on which each party lists, in order of precedence, candidates to represent that particular Land or State. In this way, the voter may vote for one candidate representing one party but vote for another party on the Land List. The Bundestag has 496 members of whom 248 are elected directly and 248 are elected via the Land List.

According to Mr. Pfnorr, the current issues in the election campaign for 1987 were: Foreign Policy, Economy, and the Environment. When questioned about the direction of the election campaign of the FDP, he replied that most efforts were being directed toward the second vote or List vote. Mr. Pfnorr explained that although the FDP were not represented in any of the Land legislatures, they had been an integral part of the federal governing coalitions for several years, first with the Christian Democratic Union (CDU) and Christian Social Union (CSU) to 1969; then with Social Democratic Party (SDP) to 1982 when they returned to a coalition with the CDU/CSU.

The FDP were anticipating a slight increase in their percentage of the vote due to the fierce fight between Franz Josef Strauss, leader of the CSU and the current Foreign Minister, Mr. Genscher of the FDP. A change in this post could lead to a major shift in foreign policy towards South Africa, East/West issues and the Third World.

Regarding the funding the parties receive the parties receive financing from public funds based on their percentage of the vote. The FDP anticipated that their election budget would reach approximately 6 million DM, the SPD budget would probably approach 50 million DM, while the CDU/CSU budget would probably be 100 million DMs. The large size of the budgets was based on the fact that this was a winter campaign and that more emphasis was being placed on television advertising rather than on the usual campaign literature. To control contributions to the political parties, each of the parties presents to the President of the Bundestag their books indicating donations from both private and corporations. Limitations on the size of political donations occurs only after a significant level has been reached. The exact limit was not available.

Following this meeting the delegation attended a luncheon hosted by the President of the Bundesrat, Mr. Holger Börner, Minister-President of Hesse.

The afternoon was spent meeting with representatives of the CDU party headquarters and the Konrad-Adenauer Foundation. At the CDU party headquarters the delegates were met by Dr. Roland Wegener, Head of the Office for Foreign Relations.

Dr. Wegener spent some time outlining the CDU policies on the election issues, including the growing ties between Germany and North America, the importance of the European unity in the Common Market, and the basic confrontation between the CDU/CSU social market economy and the SPD version of a state controlled economy.

When questioned about the possible result of the FDP losing their 5 per cent of the vote and the CDU receiving 39 per cent with a combined SPD and Green vote of 48 per cent, Dr. Wegener replied that in such a case the Federal President would have to decide which party would form the next government.

Questions were raised regarding the use of electronic equipment in the election campaign. The CDU has a complex system of electronic networking which ties each of the riding offices into the headquarters computer. This allows for immediate transmission of policy statements and allows for rapid reaction from the ridings on current issues. The system also allows the CDU to communicate directly with the CSU party headquarters in Munich. Also discussed was the possibility of another grand coalition of the CDU/CSU with the SPD, from which it was noted that the two parties have drifted too far apart since the last grand coalition in the 1960s for such an action to be possible today.

On a question regarding the number and role of women candidates in the CDU, Dr. Wegener replied that women are included as candidates, but that to increase the number of women in position to be elected would require longterm planning and an increase in the number of women active at the grassroots levels of the riding associations.

The CDU active campaign strategy is to encourage voters to vote CDU on both the first and second votes. Their feeling from polls is that the CDU/CSU can probably win a majority. They also hope to pick up much of the first time and youth vote through stressing the secure economic growth currently being experienced under the CDU/CSU government. With regard to polls, Dr. Wegener informed the delegation that the CDU samples to the last day and uses the polling expertise of researchers at the Konrad Adenauer Foundation.

This meeting was followed by a meeting at the Konrad Adenauer Foundation, where Mr. Joseph Thesing, Head of the International Institute provided some background information on the Foundation and stressed its importance in the political system. He noted that the budget for the Konrad Adenauer Foundation was 140 million DM of which 90 per cent is provided by public funds. Much of the funds are directed towards political education in the Third World, with an emphasis on new Democracies in South America. Research is always an important part of the activities of the foundation, which has two methods of distributing the projects, one is to do it within the foundation and the other is to send it out to universities. Much of the research currently being carried out is on the future of the social market economy and the changing attitudes towards nuclear power as a result of the Chernobyl disaster.

With regard to the direct or indirect links to the CDU, he noted that the Board of Directors always included prominent politicians from the party. Much of the discussion revolved around what direct links existed between the foundation and the political party supporting it.

The delegation attended a dinner hosted by the Director of the Bundestag on Monday evening. Dr. Bückner had included among the guests several members of the Bundestag who were not running for re-election and some of the Berlin representatives who are not elected directly. The dinner afforded the delegates the opportunity to meet with German parliamentarians to discuss in more detail the information they had received during the day.

On Tuesday, January 20, the delegates met with Mr. Reinhard Kaiser, legislative assistant to Ms. Anne Borgmann, MP representing the Green Party. During the discussions, Mr. Kaiser elaborated on the history of environmental questions and concerns with nuclear armaments which had led to the birth of the Green Party. Their impression that neither of the major parties was willing to take an active role in reducing the amount of pollution and work actively towards disarmament and the dismantling of nuclear power plants in Germany allowed the various groups to coalesce into one political party which presented several candidates in the 1983 General Election. The Greens currently have 27 members in the Bundestag and are represented in seven of the ten state parliaments, in addition to sitting on most municipal governments.

At present, Mr. Kaiser noted, the Greens are the only political party in the Bundestag without a political foundation. In the recent past, the Greens had challenged the right of public funds going to the foundations which are not supposed to have direct links with their sponsoring political parties. The case was defeated, and dependent on the results of the January election, there is a strong possibility that the Greens will have their own political foundation within two to three years.

When questioned by the delegates on the future policies of the Greens, Mr. Kaiser replied that over the past four years, the caucus members had developed a more pragmatic approach to environmental issues, although the determination to push for strong pollution controls is still a major policy. This led to a discussion on the Greens policies towards nuclear disarmament, and Germany's membership in NATO. The response indicated that the Greens see NATO as a deterrent to complete disarmament and only the complete withdrawal of Germany from NATO would allow for any form of disarmament.

When questioned on the possible coalition of the Green Party with the SPD, Mr. Kaiser replied that the SPD would have to meet two conditions: the removal of all Cruise missiles on German soil and a move away from nuclear power plants within two years. Since the chances of the SPD agreeing to these conditions are very unlikely there was little chance of a coalition between the two parties.

Of interest to the delegation, was the attitude towards women in politics as expressed by the Greens. Of all the parties met during the visit to Germany, the Greens appear to be the party presenting the most women for office and showing the largest percentage of elected women. This was evident in the fact that in the recent state elections in Hamburg, the Greens had presented an all women slate of candidates and all 10 had been elected.

Unlike the other political parties represented in the Bundestag, the Greens do not support the German policy of Ostpolitik in East-West relations, rather, they would prefer to encourage better relations with all peoples of Eastern Europe.

The final questions of the delegates concerned the Greens prediction of their results in the January 25 elections. Mr. Kaiser stated their informal polls indicated an anticipated increase in their percentage of the vote to seven per cent.

The afternoon was spent meeting with members of the Social Democratic Party (SPD) and representatives of the Friedrich Ebert Foundation. Mr. Hans Eberhard Dingels, International Secretary of the SPD and two of his colleagues met with the delegates. They gave an update on the election and its issues vis-à-vis the SPD. Although the party had anticipated increased support in the early fall, the loss of seats in the Bavarian state elections and the loss of the government in the Hamburg state elections had dampened enthusiasm and morale prior to Christmas. According to Mr. Dingels, this had improved substantially in the past few weeks and the organizers were anticipating their losses in the election would be much smaller than anticipated.

Much of the discussions centered on the same questions as had been posed to the CDU, FDP and Greens. Regarding the possibility of a coalition of the SPD and Greens, the reply was negative, Mr. Dingels stated that it would be impossible in view of their differences on both defence and economic issues. The SPD has changed its policy with regard to nuclear power plants since the Chernobyl disaster; they, however, see a phase-out of nuclear power over a ten year period. He also stated that, even if agreement could be reached on the larger questions, such a coalition would threaten the stability of the government over small questions.

One of the delegates questioned the effect the Green party was having on the policy directions of the SPD. The response indicated that over the past few years, the SPD had taken many of the questions on the environment and disarmament more seriously. Today, both parties were seeking the young or first time voter and the election results will indicate which of the two has been successful.

An active discussion ensued regarding the future of socialist parties in Europe and in particular in Germany. Changes in the social structures, economic bases, and in the workforce have led to shrinking ties between the traditional SPD voter and the party. The party is working closely with its foundation to try to find new directions for a society in full transformation in the 1990s. This research will be done in consultation with trade unions, churches and other elements of society.

Regarding participation of women in political life within the SPD, the response indicated that efforts were being made to encourage more women to participate at the grassroots level. Placing a woman on the ballot for direct election was difficult as most members of the Bundestag remained in power for many years; the basic problem is in convincing the local associations to accept a woman candidate. Efforts are, however being made, to ensure that women are represented at a high level on each of the Land Lists.

One of the delegates also posed the question of the use of polls during the election campaign, the response was that since the Hamburg elections there was some distrust in the poll results and that although polls were still being conducted, their results were not being used to the same degree as in previous elections. The SPD has decided not to use direct mail for canvassing as it proved to be too cost intensive, however, telephone canvassing was being done in some areas. The latter is not widespread due to concerns that the average German voter would not appreciate being disturbed in his home.

This meeting was followed by a meeting with Dr. Ernst Kerbusch, the Deputy Director of the International Division of the Friedrich Ebert Foundation which is linked to the SPD. Dr. Kerbusch stated that this foundation is Germany's oldest having been founded in 1925, and that it has served as a model for the others which started in the 1950s.

Its basic aim is to foster democratic development within Germany and to provide working class students with a higher education. The foundation provides scholarships for over 2,200 students every year at both German and foreign universities. Candidates for these scholarships do not have to belong to the SPD, although many of them do eventually become members. He noted that all the foundations emphasize their research activities and that all material is published for public use, and the fostering of democratic ideals in the developing world. The foundations share a close relationship with the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of Germany, in that they also dispense much of the development aid of the government. They try to co-ordinate aid programs in the Third World, but this does not always prevent overlapping of projects. All the foundations maintain offices in the Third World but few in the developed or Western world. In the case of the Friedrich Ebert Foundation, it also maintains offices in Tokyo and Italy.

On Wednesday, the delegation travelled to Munich where they met with the Vice-President of the Bavarian Landtag, Mr. Mueslein and the Director of the Bavarian Chancellory Dr. Kessler. During the meeting with Mr. Mueslein, the delegates learned about the differences between the German federal system of government and the Canadian. The Bavarian parliament has two chambers, a House of Representatives and a Senate.

Later that afternoon, the Canadian Consul General George Blackstock held a briefing on the role of the Consulate in Munich. Its primary aim is to improve trade relations with Germany. The Consulate tries to develop links with members of the large manufacturing firms in Munich and Bavaria and encourage Canadian manufacturers to participate in the international trade fairs which offers an ideal platform to publicize Canadian products. Thursday, the delegates visited the BMW plant where they saw a modern plant which makes very effective use of robotics and semi-robotics in the assembly of their products. Some delegates inquired whether the sales of BMWs in Canada would lead to the opening of an assembly plant in the country. The answer was that sales in Canada were not high enough to justify opening a plant in Canada, however, BMW does operate a subsidiary in the Toronto area to deal with customer service and parts.

That afternoon, the delegates met with Dr. Wolfgang Held, Deputy Secretary General of the Christian Social Union (CSU).

Dr. Held expressed great optimism that the CDU/CSU/FDP would win at the elections and that any improvement in the percentage received by the Greens would be at the expense of the SPD. The primary campaign goal of the CSU in this election was to strengthen the power of the CSU in Bonn, in particular to increase the number of CSU members represented in the Cabinet.

Although the CSU is limited to Bavaria, it feels that it is a national party representing the majority of German voters. The unique situation of the CSU lies in the traditional independence of the Bavarian people who did not wish to join with the CDU in the early 1950s as they felt it did not reflect their views on the social and political scene.

Dr. Held gave some of the historical background to the CSU and the role Mr. Franz Josef Strauss, Minister President of Bavaria, and leader of the CSU, has played in maintaining its high profile in German politics. The delegates were given an outline of some of the policies of the CSU which tended to be somewhat more traditional than those of the CDU, a reflection of Mr. Strauss' wish that the CSU hold the extreme right of the political spectrum in Germany. Although the party at its origin reflected the traditional agricultural base of Bavaria, it has continued to maintain a changing face with the changing social climate. Dr. Held noted that during the last elections, the CSU picked up many trade union votes which have traditionally gone to the SPD, a result of the CSU finding a place for everyone in its policies.

On the other hand the CSU does not make any special efforts to ensure that women can become candidates as, this is not a reflection of the traditional view of the German woman. If a woman strives to become successful in the political life, she will be supported, but the traditional view of a woman is that of homemaker and mother. It is very difficult to tell whether more women have joined the workforce as no national census has been held in Germany for 12 years and there is no accurate data available.

The delegates also had the opportunity to discuss with Dr. Held the CSU reaction to the effects of the Greens on the political scene. For the most part, the CSU does not see the Greens as a longterm viable force in German politics; their strength of today is a reflection of the weakening of the SPD forces in Germany.

Some of the discussions led to lively exchanges between the Canadian delegates and their hosts on the future of regional parties in both Germany and Canada.

Also covered in the discussions with the Deputy Secretary General of the CSU were the question of the CSU's view of the role of NATO, the answer being that the CSU sees NATO as indispensable to German freedom and the future.

On the question of German nationalism, the CSU supports the view that young Germans should take pride in being German and not let the years of the Third Reich blind them to the rest of German history. The period between 1939 and 1945 must be faced by all Germans and taken as a lesson for the future.

On Friday, January 23, the delegation travelled to Berlin, where they met with several members of the Bundestag representing Berlin. This was possible because the representatives from Berlin are not elected by the general population but rather by the Senate and these elections had already been held. This meeting, as well as the meeting with the Governing Mayor of Berlin, Eberhard Diepgen, enabled the delegates to gain a better understanding of the unique role played by West Berlin in East/West relations. During the meeting with Mayor Diepgen, the delegates questioned him on the difficulties of running a city in consultation with four governing powers, the Americans, the British, the French and the Russians. Mayor Diepgen explained that the Americans, British and French are no longer regarded as occupying powers but as protecting powers and that along the years a friendly liaison has been established. During the discussions, the delegates learned some of the problems of being an enclave territory. For example the human and industrial waste products are handled by paying the East German government to take the wastes away; this creates pollution problems for the East Germans, but their need for foreign currency seems to override the pollution question.

One aspect of the visit to Berlin which impressed all delegates was the visit to the Reichstag and the opportunity to view the Wall. The delegates were informed that although the Reichstag has been completely renovated on the inside to take a plenary session of the Bundestag, the building could not be used for this purpose until the two Germanies are re-united. In the meantime, the plenary hall is used for conferences and Bundestag Committee meetings held in Berlin.

The Berlin parliamentarians were very pleased to have a Canadian parliamentary delegation visiting their city and took every occasion to welcome them and inform them about their plans for the future and how they govern their city. During the visit this feeling was expressed by the Vice-President of the Berlin House of Representatives Mr. Alexander Longolius during a luncheon he hosted in honour of the delegation. The delegates were informed of the efforts made by the parliamentarians to ensure a viable economy and growth for the city through co-operation between the universities and industry to develop products for market.

Sunday, January 25 was election day in Germany and the delegates, having returned to Bonn to observe the elections, were able to visit a polling station to observe how the process of two votes was actually carried out. The other main difference with our system resides in the fact that the voters list is maintained at main administrative offices in each city, town or village and it is the responsibility of the voter to go there and ensure he or she is on the list.

Following the visit to the polling station the delegation went to the main Bundestag building to observe the results. During this visit, the delegation had the honour to be met by the President of the Bundestag, Dr. Philipp Jenninger who welcomed their interest in the election and explained how the results were calculated.

The delegation then split up and went to spend the rest of the evening at the various party headquarters. The pleasure of having a Canadian parliamentary delegation interested in their elections was reflected in the opportunities that were provided to the delegates to meet with the well-known candidates of each party. Some of the delegates had the opportunity to meet the Chancellor Kohl at the CDU headquarters, others to meet Count Lambsdorff, the Economic Minister from the FDP; while another met with former Chancellor Schmidt at the SPD party headquarters.

Monday, the delegation travelled back to Lahr where as a result of the delay in the flight back to Canada, the Oberbürgermeister of Lahr, Werner Deitz, seized the opportunity to host a reception in the honor of the delegation. It is worthwhile to note that this year marks the 15th anniversary of the twinning of the City of Lahr with the City of Belleville, Ontario.

In all, the visit to Germany proved to be very informative for all members of the delegation and proved once again the close ties which have been developing between the Parliaments of both Canada and the Federal Republic of Germany.

Respectfully submitted,

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-22

THIRD REPORT OF COMMITTEE

TUESDAY, June 23, 1987

The Special Committee of the Senate on the subject-matter of Bill C-22 has the honour to present its

THIRD REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of Bill C-22, An Act to amend the Patent Act, and to provide for certain matters in relation thereto, has studied the said subject-matter and has heard evidence from almost 200 witnesses, in Ottawa and the provincial capitals. The testimony presented to your Committee reflected a wide range of opinions on all aspects of the subject. The witnesses represented a number of organizations including the pharmaceutical industry, seniors, labour unions, consumers, health care workers, and the medical and pharmaceutical research communities. The Committee also heard from private individuals and representatives of some provincial and territorial governments. We report this evidence to the Senate, for your consideration before Bill C-22 receives second reading.

EFFECT ON DRUG PRICES

The main concern of opponents to this Bill relates to the effect it will have on drug prices paid by Canadians. Rising drug prices affect all Canadians regardless of whether they can take advantage of provincially-run pharmacare programs, are part of private drug reimbursement schemes or pay all of their prescription costs themselves.

The 1969 amendments to the Patent Act which provided for compulsory licences to import patented pharmaceutical products were a response to what the government of the day saw as unacceptably high drug prices. These prices were the result of a patent system that granted a high degree of monopoly power to patent-holding firms, resulting in little competition in the industry.

This view of the industry in the pre-1969 period was widespread. Three major studies of the Canadian industry (the Report of the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, the Hall Commission and the House of Commons Harley Committee) concluded that Canadian drug prices were unacceptably high.

The claim that these changes resulted in cost savings to Canadian consumers of prescription drugs has been unchallenged; there was little doubt in anyone's mind that the large-scale use of compulsory licences to import had a beneficial effect on prices. There is some debate, however, over the extent of this effect. Many witnesses referred to the findings of the Commission of Inquiry on the Pharmaceutical Industry (the Eastman Commission Report) which estimated that the compulsory licensing of patented medicines saved Canadians $211 million in 1983. This figure was challenged in the brief of the Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada (PMAC). That brief argued that the Eastman sample of drugs included a number which were off patent and one which had no generic equivalent at that time. According to the PMAC, the appropriate calculation of the cost savings to Canadians as a consequence of compulsory licensing in 1983 is $126 million. Despite this discrepancy, even the PMAC recognized the beneficial impact of compulsory licensing on drug costs.

Other witnesses presented evidence as to the savings generated through the use of generic drugs. The government of Manitoba, for example, estimated that Manitobans saved over $14 million in 1986 by using generic products. The Ontario Hospital Association indicated that that Ontario hospitals saved about $12 million in 1983 due to the combined effects of compulsory licensing, hospitals' organized group purchasing and formulary systems.

Although generic competition has produced significant cost savings, it is evident that even further savings could be generated by the increased use of generic products currently on the market.

Statistics relating to the province of Saskatchewan presented to the Committee by the Saskatchewan Health Coalition Inc. indicated that of the more than 5 million prescriptions covered by the Saskatchewan Prescription Drug Plan, in 1984-85 approximately 2.8 million (55%) were represented by products for which generic competition was available. Yet of these 2.8 million prescriptions, 1.1 million were filled with "no substitution" orders. Similarly, the province of Manitoba stated that over 50% of the prescriptions under its drug plan could have been filled by generic products. The Saskatchewan data noted that there were few therapeutic reasons to justify the level of "no substitution" prescribing.

While there was a general consensus on the effect on prices of the 1969 amendments, no such consensus existed among witnesses regarding the effects of Bill C-22. The Canadian Drug Manufacturers Association (CDMA) argued that the Bill would cost Canadians $660 million in higher prescription prices in 1995. Although such forecasting is of course difficult and fraught with danger, the CDMA believes that this is a reasonable estimate. This higher cost to consumers comes from two sources. In the first place, generic copies of brand name drugs sell for 30% of the single-source price, on average. Secondly, brand name drug prices also fall in the face of generic competition. The CDMA argued that brand name prices fall by about 40% after generics start to compete with them.

The only extensive critique of this estimate has come from the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and was presented to the Committee by the Minister, the Hon. Harvie Andre. The Department's calculation is approximately $159 million, or about one-half billion dollars less than the CDMA figure.

There are several reasons for this discrepancy. The Department feels that only 30% of drugs under 10 years of age will be subject to compulsory licensing, which is still twice as high as recent data indicate. The CDMA is of the view that one-half of such drugs will be subject to competition from generics. The Department assumes that generics will take 20% of the market they compete in, while the CDMA believes that a 40% market share is more appropriate. Finally, the two groups have different views as to the pricing of drugs in the face of competition. The Department argues that generics, on average, are priced at 50% of the single-source drug price and the advent of competition tends to drive brand name prices down by about 20%. The CDMA contends that generics are priced at about 30% of single-source prices and the advent of competition drives brand name prices down by about 40%. It is these differences in basic assumptions which account for the discrepancy in calculated effects of Bill C-22.

There is considerable debate as to which assumptions are correct. The Department's assumptions are based on recent industrial performance. In many instances, the assumptions come from the Eastman Report. The CDMA assumptions are based on a continuing maturation of generic manufacturers, enabling them to speed up the introduction of generic copies and to market them more aggressively. The pricing assumptions of that group come from the Ontario Drug Benefit Formulary of December 1986.

The primary concern of many witnesses appearing before the Committee was that Bill C-22 would result in future drug cost increases. Indeed, a number of provincial governments who appeared before the Committee cited the potential for increased costs as the principal reason for their opposition to the Bill. Some witnesses attempted to quantify these increases while others were unable to do so.

The province of New Brunswick estimated that the Bill would add $2 million annually to drug expenditures. The province of Newfoundland and Labrador noted that there were no precise estimates of the effect of the Bill but officials were clearly of the view that it would, over time, increase the cost of operating the province's drug plan. The government of Ontario presented the Committee with a range of estimated cost increases that might arise from Bill C-22. These ranged from a low of $340 million over 10 years (excluding new drugs) to a high of about $1 billion over the same period when new drugs are included. As well, the province of Manitoba's analysis indicates possible increases in the next 10 years of over 400% and a cost of delay in the introduction of generic drugs of over $1 billion.

Ontario also pointed to other costs associated with the Bill including, increased costs to the provinces to monitor drug prices and make submissions to the prices review board, increased costs to companies to generate the data requested by the Board and legal costs to both companies and governments in the challenge and defence of Board decisions.

Consumer groups, labour organizations and associations concerned with health care all felt that the Bill would result in increases in the costs of drugs. They were concerned about the impact of the Bill on health care plans run by the provinces and private insurers and the consequences for Canadians who pay their own prescription costs. Many felt that increased drug costs would erode provincial drug reimbursement schemes and have a negative impact on the health care system generally.

Senior citizens and the disabled are heavy users of prescription medicines. The Senior Citizen's Central Council of Calgary informed the Committee that seniors consumed 25% of prescription drugs in Canada although they account for only 10% of the population. These groups were worried about the effect the Bill would have on prices. Although seniors enjoy wide coverage from provincial pharmacare plans, they are not reimbursed for all expenses. Many provincial plans have a deductible component and cover less than 100% of expenditures beyond that initial amount. In some provinces, these plans do not cover the dispensing fee.

Also of concern to some is the fact that certain drugs are ineligible for public reimbursement. The British Columbia Coalition of the Disabled noted that over-the-counter drugs such as antihistamines and laxatives are very important for some people in order that they may lead a normal life. Such drugs are not covered by the B.C. pharmacare program. The N.W.T. Council for Disabled Persons noted that the pharmacies in the Territory are not required to stock generic products. The higher prices associated with this, and the already high cost of living in the north combine to make life financially difficult for the disabled.

Seniors groups were almost all of the view that drug prices would increase. The National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation testified that "it is the belief that many seniors will, in future if the Bill becomes law, have to pay much higher prices for all new drugs". The Manitoba Society of Seniors noted that "in Manitoba alone, a $15 million per year shortfall in pharmacare subsidies to the consumer has been predicted" as a result of Bill C-22.

The Consumers' Association of Canada, Nova Scotia Branch, indicated that the cost of certain drug plans in Nova Scotia is already increasing. Blue Cross is renewing its contracts to underwrite drug plans in that province at a 15.4% increase. The Consumers' Association wondered how much of this increase is influenced by Bill C-22.

Whatever the appropriate assumptions and results, it is clear that Bill C-22 will delay the introduction of new generic drugs and result in a cost penalty to consumers. The ultimate effect on the total drug bill of Canadians will depend upon the ability of the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board (the Board) to counter the deleterious impact on the prices of those drugs whose generic competition is delayed by this Bill.

The Committee heard testimony from the Minister that the prices review board would have a significant beneficial impact on the prices of all drugs. In most of the 1970s, drug prices in Canada increased at a slower rate than the Consumer Price Index (CPI). Since 1979, this trend changed with drug prices rising faster than the CPI. One of the factors the Board can look at in determining whether drug price increases are excessive is the CPI. According to the estimates of the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, this Board could save Canadians over $500 million in 1995 if it keeps drug price increases to a rate no higher than the CPI and if drug prices would otherwise have increased one percentage point faster than the CPI. If the real increase in drug prices would otherwise be higher than 1%, and the Board can again limit increases to the CPI, the savings to Canadians will be even higher.

The Minister was very confident in the efficacy of the Board, in particular because Dr. H.C. Eastman has agreed to be its first Chairman. Other witnesses were not nearly as confident.

THE EFFECTIVENESS OF THE PATENTED MEDICINE PRICES REVIEW BOARD

The principal function of the Board is to establish whether the prices charged for patented drugs in Canada are excessive. To that end, it is empowered to conduct an investigation of a particular drug. In determining whether a drug is priced excessively, the Board is to take into account the price of that drug in the five years previous, the prices of other drugs in the same therapeutic class, the prices of these drugs in other countries, and the Consumer Price Index. If, in the opinion of the Board, these factors do not present sufficient information about appropriate pricing, it can also examine the costs of manufacturing and marketing the drug in question.

Should the Board determine that the drug price in question is excessive, it can order a price reduction or revoke the exemption from compulsory licensing for that drug and one other drug. It is these sanctions which give the Board power to affect prices.

Revoking the exemption from compulsory licensing is likely to be an ineffective weapon against excessive prices according to Apotex Inc. Witnesses before this Committee, noted that it takes several years from the time a generic producer makes the decision to supply a product to the time it can actually market a drug. A brand-name drug company which has its exemption from compulsory licensing revoked will not suffer any ill consequences for some time. Effectively, this means that a brand-name producer would have no disincentive against excessive pricing if its patented products have only 3 or 4 years of exemption remaining.

Originally, it was intended that the Board be able to revoke the exemption from compulsory licences of all a firm's patented medicines. According to the testimony of Dr. Eastman, the sanctions contained in the proposed amendments to the Patent Act released in June 1986 gave the Board much more power and heightened its effectiveness. The Minister, however, indicated that he felt the original penalties were excessive and thus needed to be changed.

The influence of the Board is largely one of moral suasion and demonstration. It would be virtually impossible for the Board to investigate the prices of all patented drugs sold in Canada. If it indicates by its performance that any excessive prices will result in timely investigation and penalties, pharmaceutical firms will seek to keep their prices within the limits judged reasonable by the Board.

Many witnesses before the Committee questioned the realism of such a view. In their opinion, the Board has very little real power and will have only a negligible effect on pricing behaviour.

The Committee was informed that, with competition from generic drugs, the market mechanism provides an efficient and costless price control system. A prices review board is neither efficient nor costless.

The Canadian Labour Congress testified that the British experience in controlling drug prices through a bureaucracy has been far less successful than the Canadian experience with compulsory licensing. And the British board has more powers and resources than the Canadian one will have. Evidence by Dr. Robert Kerton of the Consumers' Association of Canada also indicated that the British, French and Italian experiences with drug price review boards have been unsatisfactory. Dr. P. Gorecki noted that studies of regulatory boards in general show them incapable of holding prices down to the competitive level and indicate that they impose significant private costs upon the regulated firms.

The constitutional authority of the federal government to establish a pricing board has been questioned. The Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs believes that a constitutional challenge would not be upheld.

The effectiveness of the Board has been challenged on a number of grounds. The Committee heard that regulatory boards have a history of being ineffective, often serving the interests of those they are meant to regulate, rather than serving the best interests of consumers.

It is extremely difficult to judge whether or not a price is excessive. In particular, new drugs have no historical prices by which they are to be judged. If these new drugs represent significant improvements over existing drugs, then drug prices in the therapeutic class are also a poor basis for comparison. And if the drug is introduced in Canada before other markets, or if it is only available in Canada and other traditionally high-cost markets, then the Board again has little reliable information upon which to judge the reasonableness of the price. In such a case, the Board must resort to an examination of manufacturing and marketing costs. Most manufacturing, however, takes place outside Canada, and a number of witnesses have stated that quoted costs are often vastly over-inflated. Because the Board cannot subpoena records outside Canada, its power to gather evidence necessary to deal with the pricing of multi-national firms may be seriously undermined.

Some witnesses were of the view that the multi-national pharmaceutical companies' practice of importing a medicine's active ingredients, substantially inflates the price of the final dosage form of the medicine. This practice, which is designed mainly as a means of moving corporate profits from Canada to jurisdictions with more favourable tax regimes, is known as transfer pricing. In its brief to the Committee, Torcan Chemical Ltd. noted that one pharmaceutical company refused to purchase a particular fine chemical in Canada even though a Canadian producer could make the material for less than 5% of the importation price.

The practice of transfer pricing could have an adverse impact on the ability of the Board to carry out its mandate. Firstly, as stated above, if fine chemicals are imported from other countries at over-inflated costs, the introductory price of a drug may be particularly high. Secondly, the fact that fine chemicals are purchased from jurisdictions outside of Canada, coupled with the Board's inability to subpoena records from these jurisdictions is likely to weaken the Board's information gathering ability.

A concern of many witnesses was that the Board would be particularly impotent in controlling the entry price of new medicines. Since these drugs tend to drive older drugs out of the market, the fact that the Board may control drug prices may be of little comfort. If brand name drug firms believe the Board may have some effect in controlling the price increases of existing drugs, they may counter this by inflating the entry price of new drugs. Evidence cited by the CDMA indicates that drug entry prices have already been growing rapidly and excessively. Certain new drugs have been introduced at well above $1 per tablet, something that has never happened before. Three examples were provided: Carderone at $1.50 per tablet; Pepcid at $1.37 per tablet; and Tegisin at $2 per tablet. The value of these examples is not clear, however, as daily drug costs are a more relevant statistic than the price per tablet. For example, Pepcid has a recommended dosage of one tablet per day, whereas other drugs in the same therapeutic class have recommended dosages of two and even four tablets per day. The daily therapeutic cost of Pepcid is actually no different from the average in that class, despite its high price per tablet.

The Nova Scotia Federation of Labour, in its testimony before the Committee, indicated that the criteria that the Board will use to carry out its review and information-gathering process will be of utmost importance to its successful operation. The regulatory parameters within which a board must function may constrain its effective operation. Some form of parliamentary scrutiny may be necessary prior to the implementation of regulations governing the operation of the Board to ensure that they enable the Board to effectively carry out its mandate.

It should also be noted that the Board's powers with respect to ordering price reductions and removing market exclusivity apply only to patented medicines. A medicine for which the patent has expired will not be subject to the Board's remedies for excessive pricing. This may be a particular concern in the case of older drugs which serve a relatively small market or whose chemistry is difficult to duplicate. For these drugs, there will be no price review mechanism and no generic competition.

The Board does not have authority to investigate and control the prices of generic equivalents, whether or not they are supplied under compulsory licence. A brief sent to the Committee by the New Brunswick government argues that this is a major weakness in the Board's powers. Although generic medicines are usually viewed favourably because they compete solely on the basis of price, evidence presented to the Committee indicates that a small amount of generic competition may not be sufficient to ensure that prices are not excessive. A brief presented by the Medical Reform Group of Ontario indicates that a single generic competitor reduced prices in Ontario to 81% of the most expensive brand price in 1985. It was only after four generic products were on the market that the lowest price fell to about one-half the most expensive price. The same brief showed that the rate of price decline in Manitoba was much faster. Nevertheless, these data indicate that the first one or two generic products might, for the most part, enjoy part of any excessive prices charged by brand-name drug manufacturers.

The particular concern of the New Brunswick government in this regard is that "...generic manufacturers may attempt to rectify lost future anticipated revenue due to the delayed entry of new generic products by increasing prices substantially." If this proves to be the case, then generic competition, even where it continues to exist, will not have the moderating effect on drug prices that it had in the past.

EFFECT ON RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

A major benefit of this legislation, in the view of the Minister, is the increase in research and development (R&D) it will foster. Indeed, when questioned about the high profitability of Canadian subsidiaries despite the 1969 changes, the Minister responded that their accounting profits in Canada were high precisely because these entities did not engage in significant amounts of research and development.

The brand name drug companies have typically spent about 3.5% to 4.5% of their total Canadian revenues on research and development here. The Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of Canada has made commitments to increase this ratio to 8% by 1991 and 10% by 1996, if Bill C-22 is passed. This commitment is a quid pro quo arrangement. There is nothing in the Bill to require firms or the industry to meet these higher R&D ratios.

This increase in research activity is supposed to do more than just provide employment for Canadian research scientists; it is supposed to advance Canada's position as a major player in this industry. The 10% figure for research intensity is the currently accepted ratio for world-wide research to sales expenditures. But evidence given to the Committee by Novopharm Ltd. shows that the major companies in the United States are now spending 20% of revenues on research. Indeed, these figures have been deflated by subtracting the tax credits these firms received in the United States. Gross research intensity might then be as high as 25% of sales.

Even if the PMAC companies meet their commitment of gross research expenditures equal to 10% of sales by 1996, Canada will still lag far behind the major pharmaceutical industries of the western world.

The pharmaceutical industry's commitment to increase research spending would involve an additional $1,400 million in expenditures by 1996, over and above any additional spending which would have occurred as a result of market growth. This additional spending is expected to create 3,000 new jobs by that time.

Witnesses differed in their opinions of these commitments. The PMAC has made much of them and, in testimony before this Committee, cited the new projects of 16 of its member companies, totaling over $500 million in new investments. These announcements have been made even before passage of the Bill, and are evidence, according to the PMAC, that the industry is willing to meet its commitments without delay.

The current Canadian tax system rewards scientific research and development activity by allowing a 100% write off for such expenditures (both current and capital) and by providing an additional deduction whenever such expenditures exceed some base amount. Part of any new industry investment will thus be financed by Canadian governments. This leaves open to question, the financial contribution made by the PMAC group of companies in exchange for greater periods of exclusivity. The Consumers' Association of Canada questions "just how much of the $1.4 billion in 'new' investment which is supposed to result from Bill C-22 will in fact be tax-assisted, whether in the form of tax credits, grants or matching funds. How much of this investment will actually result from incentives other than Bill C-22?"

Many witnesses were not confident about the PMAC meeting its R&D commitments. The CDMA commented that the Bill offers no guarantees and does not contain effective enforcement provisions. They felt that cabinet and parliamentary reviews of the legislation are cumbersome ways of effecting compliance with industry commitments. That group also suggested that much of the announced investment projects would have been undertaken in any event, coming about as a result of market growth and the necessity of remaining competitive.

The research commitments have also been denigrated on the grounds that the type of research would not be of sufficiently high caliber. Many witnesses pointed out that basic research is undertaken in large facilities in the home countries of the multi-national drug firms. It is unlikely that these firms would establish basic research facilities in Canada. The promised research would likely be a form of clinical research. But clinical research should not be viewed in any way as unscientific. It is extremely important to the introduction of safe and effective drugs. Moreover, Canada now engages in only the last stages of clinical research although it is well placed to increase the scope of such activity.

Many researchers in fields of pharmacology and medicine appeared before the Committee to support of the Bill. They felt that measures to strengthen the innovative pharmaceutical industry would have a positive impact on Canadian science and health care. Bill C-22 would foster more effective collaboration between universities, medical schools and the pharmaceutical industry which would, in turn, enable the best medications to be available to Canadian patients. Many viewed the contributions of the pharmaceutical industry as essential to the maintenance and growth of medical research in Canada particularly at a time when other sources of funding are becoming more difficult to obtain.

A number of witnesses from university faculties expressed their concern about the lack of employment opportunities in Canada for university graduates in the area of pharmacology. Many of these highly qualified individuals have been forced to seek employment in the United States because adequate funding for employment and research in Canada has been unavailable. The commitments made by the PMAC to increase investment in R&D were viewed as a means to provide meaningful employment for these graduates in Canada and to build Canadian expertise.

Other witnesses noted that many benefits could arise from conducting clinical research in Canada and Bill C-22 would place Canadian universities and industry in a position to capture an increasing share of this work. Our expertise in both basic and clinical pharmacology, our health care system and diversity of population could enable Canada to advance in both basic and applied pharmacological research. Any such advancement was seen to be dependent, to a large extent, on Bill C-22.

As one clinical pharmacologist pointed out to the Committee "clinical pharmacologists are not experts in economics or economic health theories, but ... improvements in both availability of new medications, basic and clinical investigation, and excellence in teaching of new physicians will have major positive impacts on the health of Canadians."

Many witnesses noted that the Bill does not contain a definition of research, other than to adopt regulations similar to those found in the Income Tax Act. Although this would preclude marketing research costs and quality control expenditures being counted as research, the quality of the promised research and the calibre of the jobs to be created was still questioned.

Another line of criticism argued that much of the promised increased research activity would take place notwithstanding Bill C-22. The Committee heard that the regulatory procedures of Health and Welfare Canada are being revised in accordance with the recommendations of the Eastman Report. When such regulatory changes were introduced in the United Kingdom, clinical research for worldwide use increased dramatically. A similar response might be expected here. It was also pointed out that some clinical testing is being shifted to Canada from the United States as a result of the extremely high insurance costs there. These critics, then, do not deny that research expenditures will increase in Canada; rather, they contend that these increases would have taken place anyway.

The pharmaceutical industry in Canada is concentrated in the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. These two provinces account for almost all industry activity, with Ontario having a slightly higher share than Quebec. Most of the activity of generic manufacturers is located in Ontario. Most of the 3000 new jobs committed by the PMAC will be located in these provinces. Although Ontario will be a direct recipient of many of the promised investment dollars and jobs, the provincial government questioned whether they represented a fair return on the additional money that it believes consumers will be paying for drugs. The governments of Prince Edward Island and the Yukon Territory felt that their respective areas would not benefit from the PMAC's R&D commitments. Similarly, the government of Newfoundland and Labrador has had no assurances that it will benefit to any significant extent. For these jurisdictions, there were few if any direct benefits to offset against anticipated cost increases.

The Eastman Report acknowledged the importance of research and development and felt that measures should be adopted to encourage it. To this end, the Report recommended that higher royalties be paid to innovative companies by generic firms. Such royalties would be based on the worldwide research and development expenditures of the pharmaceutical industry. These royalties would be paid into a fund and distributed to innovative companies on the basis of their research and development expenditures in Canada. The approach to stimulating research in Bill C-22 differs substantially from that recommended in the Eastman Report.

EFFECT ON THE GENERIC INDUSTRY

The changes to the Patent Act as incorporated in Bill C-22 do not eliminate the market for generic drugs in Canada. All generic products which are currently on the market, with one notable exception, are unaffected by this Bill. The generic industry has grown significantly since the introduction of compulsory licensing to import in 1969. It is a maturing industry, growing in numbers and financial strength.

The CDMA has argued before this Committee that the establishment of a truly Canadian pharmaceutical industry can only come about through the growth of indigenous Canadian firms, and those are the generic companies. Evidence presented by the PMAC indicates that the generic part of the industry will not be adversely affected by this Bill, and the generic firms have never claimed that it will. However, the Bill will significantly lower the future growth of sales of generic firms and slow down their evolution into large and diversified companies like the member firms of the PMAC.

The PMAC group of companies, as a whole, have not been adversely affected by the 1969 changes to the Patent Act. A number of individual companies have been seriously harmed, however. In a similar vein, the CDMA group of companies, as a whole, will not be seriously harmed by Bill C-22. But some individual firms may bear a disproportionate share of any of the Bill's deleterious effects. The provisions relating to the pipeline drugs are a case in point, as noted by Dr. Eastman.

In particular, Apotex Inc. will be placed in extreme jeopardy by this Bill. According to the company's brief it has expanded rapidly in the past few years on the basis of the current Patent Act and in anticipation of pending approvals of new products. The company is especially concerned about the retroactive provisions of Bill C-22. Apotex is currently supplying the medicine Rinitadine under compulsory licence. With the implementation of this legislation, this drug can no longer be imported.

PERIODS OF EXCLUSIVITY

The Patent Act currently provides a 17 year monopoly to patent holders to exclusively make, use and sell a patented product in Canada. The ability to obtain a patent is not dependent on the nationality of the applicant or the location of the research and development expenditures which lead to the invention. The period of patent exclusivity applicable to patented medicines is limited by provisions of the Patent Act which require the Commissioner of Patents to grant a licence for the importation or manufacture and sale of a medicine made from a patented process. The royalty rate established by the Commissioner for such licences is 4% of the value of a licensee's sales.

Before a patentee and a generic company can bring their respective medicines on the market, they must demonstrate the safety and efficacy of the drugs and obtain a Notice of Compliance from the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The Eastman Report noted that it takes an average of 11.5 years for a generic copy of a brand-name drug to come on the market. The CDMA is of the view that this period of time has been effectively reduced to about 6 years by virtue of the current level of development of the generic industry.

Proposed changes to the compulsory licensing system which would have provided some form of increased patent protection were suggested in a 1983 discussion paper issued by the then Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and by the Eastman Report in 1985. The latter recommended a four year period of exclusivity from compulsory licensing. In his brief to this Committee, Dr. H.C. Eastman indicated that changes to the current compulsory licensing system were required, even though it has produced benefits. In his view, "...the increasing number, financial strength and efficiency of generic firms and the very low royalty rates under which licences are issued means that they can and will eventually create market conditions under which the patentees could not recover the costs including a prorata Canadian share of worldwide research and development costs." Dr. Eastman further concluded that the introduction of periods of exclusivity from compulsory licensing would result in Canadians paying their share of the worldwide research costs of innovative drug companies and would ensure that there would be no disincentives to these companies to introduce new drugs in Canada.

Bill C-22 would guarantee innovative drug companies a period of 10 years exclusivity from compulsory licences to import or seven years exclusivity from licences to manufacture where an innovative company receives its NOC for a drug after 27 June 1986. Patented medicines for which NOCs have been issued on or before 27 June 1986 and for which generic companies have obtained either NOCs or compulsory licences but not both would be entitled to seven years protection from compulsory licences to import. Medicines for which NOCs have been issued on or before 27 June 1986, but for which neither compulsory licences nor generic NOCs have been issued, would have eight years of market exclusivity. Compulsory licences to import would not be available for a Canadian invented and developed drug, while compulsory licences to manufacture such a drug would only be granted if the inventor fails to make the drug in Canada after seven years from the date that it receives an NOC for the drug.

The draft version of Bill C-22 issued by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in June 1986 contained provisions which essentially required an innovative company to earn its right to market exclusivity. The draft legislation required innovative companies to manufacture or source fine chemicals in Canada within two years of receiving their NOCs in order to maintain their exemption from compulsory licences to manufacture. This condition called for commitments by individual companies rather than global commitments by the pharmaceutical industry. Bill C-22 contains no such provision. Only companies which produce Canadian invented and developed drugs are required to manufacture these drugs in Canada within a period of time in order to maintain their greater degree of market exclusivity.

The CDMA, in its brief to the Committee, noted that the requirement for innovative companies to manufacture drugs in Canada in order to maintain their market exclusivity would have the following effects: (a) fine chemical technology would be transferred to Canada; (b) the ability to use transfer pricing for the purposes of tax shifting would be reduced; and (c) the prices review board would have a Canadian cost base for assessing the costs of making pharmaceutical products.

In its brief to the Committee, Torcan Chemical Ltd., noted that the June 1986 legislative proposal would have encouraged domestic fine chemical manufacturing "which would serve as the cornerstone for the development of a comprehensive drug discovery program in Canada". Torcan also felt that changes to our patent policy respecting medicines should ensure the availability of inexpensive drugs and provide incentives for the development of a "homegrown" pharmaceutical industry. In Torcan's opinion, Bill C-22 has not effectively addressed these issues. Linking the degree of market exclusivity with requirements to manufacture or source fine chemicals in Canada would be an important step towards keeping drugs prices at reasonable levels and ensuring increased research and manufacturing in Canada.

A number of witnesses supported the current compulsory licensing system and recommended that no changes be made. The province of New Brunswick was of the view that the current policy has "worked to the benefit of individual consumers, private drug plans and provincial reimbursement schemes ..." and wondered why a change should be made to a system which, in its view, works so well. The Consumers' Association of Canada felt that the 1969 amendments have been a success and preferred to see the status quo continue. Retention of the current system was also urged by a number of senior citizens and health care organizations who succinctly and forcefully stated to the Committee "If it ain't broke don't fix it."

The Consumers' Association of Canada and others, alleged that the initiative for Bill C-22 came not from Canada but from the United States as part of the free trade negotiations. The issue of pharmaceutical patent protection is viewed by Americans as a trade irritant which must be resolved before a free trade agreement can be signed. Proceeding in this manner may have the result of burdening Canadians with the costs of Bill C-22 even if no free trade deal is ever reached. The CAC and the Canadian Labour Congress both pointed out that the existing Canadian system is viewed favourably by many observers around the world. The American industry views it as a dangerous precedent for other countries, and even the United States.

Many witnesses, however, favoured some period of market exclusivity during which innovative firms could market their medicines without generic competition. But there were varying opinions expressed regarding the length of such a period of exclusivity. Some felt that the 10-year period contained in Bill C-22 was too long. Several witnesses recommended that the Bill be amended to adopt the Eastman Report's recommendations of a four-year period of exclusivity and the establishment of a pharmaceutical royalty fund to reward research efforts in Canada. Many witnesses involved in pharmacological research who appeared before the Committee favoured the periods of exclusivity set out in the Bill. They felt that the current policy of compulsory licensing was unfair to innovative companies. Bill C-22 was viewed as a means to increase pharmacological research and development in Canada and provide employment opportunities for university graduates. Some witnesses felt that the periods of exclusivity provided for in the Bill would encourage manufacturers to introduce a new drug at a lower price than would otherwise be the case under the current system since they would have a guaranteed period of 7 or 10 years to recoup their costs.

Dr. Eastman indicated that he preferred the recommendations contained in his 1985 report but found the Bill adequate. However, he did suggest that the seven-year period of exclusivity provided for certain pipeline drugs "might do considerable harm to generic firms that have committed resources to business plans predicated on compulsory licences that have already been granted."

EFFECT ON HEALTH CARE

Few countries regulate the cost of drugs by restricting the patent protection afforded to pharmaceutical products. But many nations have some method of limiting drug costs whether it be by controlling the number of drugs eligible for public reimbursement or setting allowable profit margins. All Canadian provinces operate programs which provide for some form of reimbursement for the costs of prescribed drugs, and most provinces have adopted measures to limit the acquisition costs of such drugs. The availability of lower-cost generic drugs has had an impact on provincial health care budgets and has resulted in savings which might not otherwise be available.

There has been considerable debate as to whether Bill C-22 will have an impact on health care costs. At the present time, prescription drugs comprise approximately 5% of these costs. Many witnesses argued that any increases in the cost of drugs will place an additional burden on already constrained health care budgets, the end result of which may be reduced levels of services and cutbacks of vital programs.

The Canadian Federation of University Women felt that higher costs would place Canada's health care system under increased financial stress. Both the Newfoundland and Labrador Command of the Royal Canadian Legion and the Manitoba Association of Registered Nurses pointed out that it was only reasonable to believe that higher drug costs will force the provinces to increase their charge for premiums or cut back on the benefits which they provide for other services. The Alberta Teachers Association was concerned that the net result of the Bill would be an erosion of funds available for education and other social services. Senior citizens were particularly concerned about possible changes to the health care system which could impact negatively on their limited financial resources.

The PMAC contended that the Bill would have a positive effect on health care. Medicines invented by brand name companies ultimately make the health care system more affordable. They also argued that the greatest portion of the savings generated through the use of medicines can be attributed to a brand name manufacturer's invention of a medicine rather than a generic company's copy.

A number of medical researchers were of the view that the Bill would lead to improved health care and in so doing may reduce overall health costs. The drug Tagamet was cited as an example of a medicine which saved millions of dollars annually in surgical and health care costs and gave ulcer patients an improved quality of life. One pharmacologist felt that if Bill C-22 was not passed "... the condition of medical research in Canada will deteriorate, and its future health will depend solely on government funding in a climate of fiscal restraint", a prospect which he did not view happily. In its brief to the Committee, the Ontario Medical Association noted that Bill C-22 must be viewed from the perspective of the patient who expects and deserves access to the best possible pharmacotherapy. They felt that Canada would be best served by creating a positive business climate from a "thriving, innovative pharmaceutical industry that promotes clinical research, product development and the early introduction to patients of important research discoveries".

A particular issue regarding health care costs that arose during the Committee's proceedings was the effect of Bill C-22 on the so-called "pipeline drugs". There are a number of drugs in the compulsory licence pipeline. As indicated elsewhere in this Report, these medicines are entitled to either seven or eight years protection from compulsory licences to import. These restrictions will effectively delay the introduction of lower-cost generic equivalents by some four to five years.

Representatives of various provincial governments testified as to the effect of this delay on their provincial health care budgets - budgets which were in many cases based upon the forecasted availability of generic copies of certain pipeline drugs. They also felt that the longer periods of exclusivity generally provided by Bill C-22 may produce price increases.

No provincial government appeared before the Committee in support of the Bill. The governments of Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland and Labrador, the Yukon Territory, Manitoba and Ontario testified before this Committee and all five were opposed to this Bill. The government of New Brunswick sent a brief to the Committee stating its opposition. A press release of the Quebec government, indicating its support for the Bill was made available to the Committee.

The Ontario market for prescription drugs is the largest in Canada, accounting for 40% of the total. The Ontario Drug Benefit Plan which covers 1 million seniors and 1/2 million persons on social assistance cost the Ontario government about $300 million in 1984/1985. The rapid growth of these expenditures since 1975 is expected by the government to increase even further with Bill C-22. This increase may even make the plan untenable.

The governments of Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland and Labrador both objected to Bill C-22, primarily on the basis of potentially increased drug costs. Neither government estimated the extent of these increased costs. But they did cite the existence of the $100 million transitional fund as evidence of higher drug costs and disagreed with the method of distributing this fund. It was argued that the proposed method of distribution does not reflect regional differences in drug programs and differences in provincial ability to pay.

These two provinces brought a unique perspective to the Committee. Residents of Atlantic provinces tend to have lower wage rates and incomes than the Canadian average. The degree and scope of drug plan coverage is also below average. However, the proportion of the population older than 65 years of age, who tend to be high drug users, is above the national average in P.E.I. Any increase in drug costs would hurt residents of these provinces disproportionately. Yet Atlantic Canada can expect to get only a small share of any increased research activity which might take place as a result of the Bill.

In the north, medical care is often affected by the remoteness of small communities. Little competition exists at the retail pharmaceutical market and many residents purchase their drugs in the south whenever possible. There is little room for residents of the north to absorb price increases.

The Manitoba government also voiced its opposition to Bill C-22. It argued that the industry is in no need of additional assistance or protection, noting that industry growth and profitability are well above the average for manufacturing as a whole. That government also felt that the research commitments of the PMAC are not very convincing. As a consequence, the cost of Bill C-22 in the form of higher drug prices is not countered with guaranteed research benefits nor is it needed to maintain the viability of the pharmaceutical industry in Canada.

The following presents a more detailed account of the provincial positions on this Bill.

The government of Prince Edward Island objects to Bill C-22 primarily on the basis of potentially increased drug costs and feels that the Bill may not be the right answer.

The percentage of elderly citizens in that province significantly exceeds the Canadian average (approximately 12.3% versus 9.7% for Canada) and income levels are between 75% and 80% of the national average. Health care costs in terms of a percentage of Gross Domestic Product, have been consistently the highest of any provinces. The smallness of the province makes it difficult to deliver high quality basic programs to its residents and cost increases may have a disproportionately negative impact.

Although P.E.I. was unable to quantify the amount by which drug costs would increase, it was felt that any increase could have "...a dramatic effect on programs which serve... senior citizens".

The province is not opposed to granting innovators some period of exclusivity but believes that maximum exclusivity should be granted to those who develop new drug entities and those with products which result from research and development conducted in Canada.

The Minister of Consumer Affairs and Communications and the Minister of Health appeared before the Committee on behalf of the government of Newfoundland and Labrador. They expect the Bill to result in higher drug prices and for this reason they oppose its adoption. They are also pessimistic about the PMAC's R&D commitments. The Minister of Health noted that increased costs for health care services have placed a great deal of strain on provincial resources. Although he could not quantify the impact of Bill C-22 on health care costs, the Minister believes that the cost of operating Newfoundland's drug programs would increase, thereby compounding current financial pressures. They concluded that the net effect of the Bill would be "higher prices of drugs to all consumers, higher premiums on those enrolled in drug plans, increased costs to provincially-operated drug programs, and no significant development or increase of pharmaceutical-related manufacturing and/or research work for Newfoundland and Labrador". Any changes to the present compulsory licensing system should, in their view, take into consideration the recommendations of the Eastman Report.

The Yukon government feels that the Bill is not "... in the best economic or health interest of Canadians". That government questioned why health care dollars should go to support already profitable multi-national drug companies. In its view, serious consideration should be given to adopting the Eastman Report recommendations or limiting exclusivity to those companies who are carrying out the synthesis, manufacturing and compounding of drug products in Canada.

The government of Manitoba does not support Bill C-22. It feels that the Bill would have a significant impact on raising drug prices in exchange for research and development commitments by the brand-name companies which are dubious at best.

That government endorses the recommendations of the Eastman Report with respect to the speeding up of preclinical new drug submissions, toxicology studies, new drug submissions and the issuance of notices of compliance. These steps would benefit Canadians by introducing new drugs 2 to 3 years earlier, reducing drug prices and increasing research investment by 50%. Apparently, the Manitoba government does not endorse the other Eastman recommendations. With respect to the regulatory changes outlined above, the brief states "we are pleased to note that steps are being made to speed up the new drug evaluation process. We question whether other economic incentives are necessary."

The Ontario government recognizes the need for some changes to the Patent Act. The government is opposed to the Bill, however. Expenditures under the Ontario Drug Benefit Plan (ODB) have increased rapidly over the past ten years. The Bill will add to that growth, so much so that "the government of Ontario believes that Bill C-22 could increase ODB costs to the point where this important health care benefit in Ontario could become financially untenable." The total costs of this Bill to Ontario taxpayers might reach $1 billion over ten years.

In addition to these obvious costs, the Bill is expected to add substantial costs in other ways. The Board must be organized and staffed. To keep track of drug prices in Canada will likely cost more than the projected $500,000 annual figure. Drug companies must incur costs to generate data requested by the Board while individuals and provincial governments incur costs in order to make submissions to the Board. If legal challenges result from the Board's decisions, further costs arise. By replacing market competition with a regulatory board, a wide range of expenses are created which are often overlooked.

Ontario questioned the quality of the promised research expenditures, noting that most existing expenditures in this regard constitute clinical testing only. It also noted that much of this increased activity will be offset by a reduction in the growth of the generic sector. In summary, the brief concluded that "...our Ontario evaluation indicates that the federal government has overestimated the benefits of Bill C-22, and to a great extent, underestimated the Bill's associated costs."

The government of Ontario recommended that a minimum period of four years of market exclusivity be granted to a new drugs. This would increase to seven years if the fine chemicals are sourced in Canada and final dosage forms are compounded here. This period of market exclusivity would increase to ten years if the product had been priced fairly, the view of the Board, in the first seven years. If, in addition to the above requirements, the research and development leading to the discovery of the drug was carried out substantially in Canada, the period of exclusivity would be twenty years. This latter recommendation is largely consistent with the provisions of Bill C-22.

The Ontario brief also proposed "that the provinces be granted the right to a waiver to the federal Patent Act in terms of the exclusivity period granted to new drug products. This would only apply when the province acts as a purchaser and distributor of medicines to institutions."

The government of New Brunswick expressed its concern over Bill C-22 in a brief sent to the Committee and indicated that this position has been held for the past two years. The province feels that the existing system works very well and sees no essential reason for changing it. Indeed, the Canadian system is viewed by many in the U.S. as a model to emulate. Although some argument might be made for changing the current system, Bill C-22 provides an excessive amount of exclusivity.

As an example of the consequences of this Bill, the brief cites the case of Zantac. The provincial drug plan spends $1.6 million per year on this drug, an amount equal to 4% of program costs. This is considered excessive by the province. The generic equivalent, Ranitidine, could save the province at least $250,000 per year. This product may be adversely affected by Bill C-22.

The government made five recommendations in its brief. It recommended that: 1) the period of exclusivity should not exceed 4 or 5 years; 2) patent protection should be tied to the sourcing of fine chemicals in Canada; 3) the Patented Medicine Prices Review Board should have the power to control generic drug prices; 4) the $100 million transitional fund should be increased and extended beyond four years; and 5) "me too" brand-name drugs should be priced at no more than 80 % of the original brand-name product.

The governments of Nova Scotia, Quebec, Saskatchewan, Alberta, British Columbia and the North West Territories did not make representations to the Committee. However, the Minister of Industry and Commerce for Quebec issued a press release concurrently with the Committee's hearings in Quebec City on June 12, 1987 which reaffirmed the Quebec government's support for the Bill and urged its speedy adoption. Noting that a large portion of the Canadian innovative pharmaceutical industry is located in Quebec, the Minister stated that it was urgent that adequate patent protection be provided to this sector. Quebec stands to gain a substantial number of the investment dollars and jobs promised a by the PMAC.

The Bill gives the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs the authority to pay to the provinces the sum of $100 million over a four-year period ending in 1991. The Minister indicated that this sum is designed to compensate the provinces for increases in the cost of drugs that might arise from the delay in the introduction of generic equivalents of the pipeline drugs. The federal government estimates that the provinces can expect expenditure increases in the order of $95 million over four years as a result of this delay. Several witnesses, including some of the provinces noted above were of the view that $100 million may not be sufficient to cover anticipated expenditure increases. The Committee also heard evidence that the manner in which the $100 million is to be distributed may be inequitable. Some argued that provinces with particularly generous drug reimbursement programs will suffer disproportionately high cost increases. Others noted that the poorer provinces will find it extremely difficult to fund programs, which are already financially strained, in the face of expenditure increases. The Atlantic provinces are in such a situation, and the Committee has heard suggestions that the fund be distributed according to the formulas used to distribute equalization payments.

REVIEWS BY CABINET AND PARLIAMENT

The Bill provides for two reviews of the changes to the compulsory licensing system that it will create. Firstly, upon the expiration of four years after section 41.11 comes into force, the Cabinet can review the operation of the system and either reduce or revoke the periods of protection provided for. Secondly, after the expiration of nine years, Parliament will conduct a comprehensive review. The PMAC indicated to the Committee that it welcomed these reviews and viewed them as a mechanism to ensure that its R&D commitments would be met. Others felt that the Cabinet review mechanism was somewhat deficient because it was not a mandatory review and because it did not provide for the automatic suspension of the prohibition against compulsory licensing in the event that the innovative companies do not fulfill their R&D commitments.

The Cabinet review mechanism has also been questioned as part of the general critique of the pharmaceutical industry's R&D promises. The fact that an industry association makes the promise but an individual firm undertakes the investment is a concern. There is a possibility that some firms will attempt to play the "free rider" in this regard. Some witnesses questioned why benefits should be given to an entire industry when only a handful may be willing to invest here. Others wondered whether the government would penalize an entire industry, including those who make investments in research which exceed their expected share, just because some firms refuse to make any investment expenditures. It is true that the prices review board can now publish company statistics on sales and research, and it is hoped that this provision will provide an element of moral suasion for individual firms to meet or even exceed investment targets.

CONCLUDING REMARKS

Your Committee has spent a great deal of time and effort studying the subject-matter of Bill C-22. In the process it has heard from many witnesses, representing hundreds of thousands of Canadians from all facets of society. Witnesses who appeared before the Committee were mostly opposed to the Bill in its present form and they represented large numbers of Canadians. The majority of the Committee is inclined to agree with their opinion.

Bill C-22 has not yet passed second reading in the Senate and we felt it would be best to report the concerns of Canadians on this subject and allow the Senate to use this information in making its decision on second reading.

Respectfully submitted,

M. LORNE BONNELL,
Chairman.

THE SENATE

Thursday, June 25, 1987

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.
Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE JOHN MORROW GODFREY

NEWSPAPER REPORT OF INTERVIEW—APOLOGY AND CORRECTION

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Honourable senators, in a widely reported telephone interview with a Canadian Press reporter, I referred to senators who were physically incapable of taking their seats in the Senate as "vegetables." This was a thoughtless, cruel and inaccurate expression which I deeply regret and for which I sincerely and unreservedly apologize.

The Canadian Press article further stated:

In the late fifties, the Senate set up a committee to review the attendance record of Nova Scotia Senator Charles Hawkins. But he died before the committee decided whether to kick him out or not.

I made no reference to Senator Hawkins in my interview and, in fact, had never heard of him before. I was informed by a member of his family that Senator Hawkins' attendance record was excellent and, in fact, he was an active chairman of a committee and that no such Committee of Review was ever set up.

S.A. Kuntz's book The Modern Senate of Canada, at pages 165-166, states that such a Committee of Review was set up on January 15, 1957, with respect to Senator Joseph James Duffus from Ontario, who died shortly afterwards.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I want to make one comment to reinforce the statement made by Senator Godfrey about the late Senator Hawkins from Nova Scotia, whose name was mentioned in that article which cast unfair, inaccurate and serious aspersions on his performance as a senator.

Senator Hawkins was a member of the Senate of Canada when I was first elected to the House of Commons. I knew him as a very serious member of the Senate, who was on the job all the time. I very much regret that, even inadvertently, that reference was made in the newspapers, which casts reflections upon his memory and which has caused deep pain to members of his family.

TRIBUTES ON RETIREMENT

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, this may be the appropriate time for us to recognize the fact that after today we will not be enjoying—or, for that matter, not enjoying—interventions by Senator Godfrey.

We sometimes pay tribute to retired senators when they are not present to hear our remarks.

Perhaps Senator Godfrey could just confirm that I am correct that he will be leaving us today?

Hon. John M. Godfrey: Yes, you are.

Senator Frith: Then, I would like to say a word or two about my old friend, Jack Godfrey, who, speaking metaphorically, was a comrade-in-arms in party work for the Liberal Party of Canada and Ontario. At that time there was not the division between the two parties that there is today, or perhaps I should say they were not in two different divisions. These days one must be very careful in one's choice of words, especially with Senator Murray lurking in the reeds, ready to snap at the slightest double entendre.

At any rate, senators may not want to hear the long, perhaps to them, boring details of my personal friendship with Jack Godfrey, and of the time we spent together working for the Liberal Party. Although I could find lengthy ways to say what I am about to say, what it comes down to is that very few senators, if any, can claim to have served in the Senate with the attention and awareness of duty, with the faithfulness to responsibility as a senator, and with the willingness always to give up, in favour of Senate responsibilities, many other things that they would rather do in the way that Senator Godfrey has done. Senator Godfrey has always given his Senate responsibilities priority. He has fulfilled those responsibilities—and I will use a tired word, perhaps that is why it is used so often; I don't want not to use it just because it is overused—he has done it with distinction, with talent and with honour. I believe that we as his fellow senators owe appreciation and best wishes to him, to his wife, Mary, and to his children that they will all enjoy his retirement. I think I can extend those wishes and express that appreciation on behalf of the Canadian people whom he has always tried to serve with devotion.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I rise to second and support very enthusiastically the declaration just made by the Deputy Leader of the Opposition concerning our friend and colleague, Senator Godfrey. It seems to me that it is quite in character for Senator Godfrey, on this his second last day in the house, to rise for the purpose of ensuring that no statement of his would have given personal offence to anyone. While he has always been a very robust and effective debater and participant in our affairs, and while he has seldom given quarter and never asked for it, at no time in my experience here have his interventions been such as to cause personal offence to anyone.

I think honourable senators know with how little enthusiasm I view the mandatory retirement of senators. I have, in my short seven or eight years here, seen too many good people leave under that rubric, and I regret it very much. Today is a classic example. I have the melancholy duty of bidding farewell to a friend and colleague. But it also gives us an opportunity, as the Deputy Leader of the Opposition has noted, to acknowledge, while he is still in a position to reply, his splendid service to Parliament and to the country.

Our colleague, Senator Davey—who would know—has written in his book that Senator Godfrey, who was appointed to the Senate in 1973, turned out to be one of the “problem” senators.

Senator Argue: Great compliment!

Senator Murray: I think that Senator Davey might have intended that as a compliment. In any case, Senator Godfrey was not a problem to me, or to the Senate in particular, but I am sure that a senator who has sometimes been described as “the gadfly of the Senate” is not always and in every circumstance a source of comfort to the party whips and to those who believe that party solidarity must come before everything.

He came here in 1973 with impressive professional credentials as a lawyer, experienced in the world of business and community service, ranging from the Canadian Council of Social Development to the National Ballet of Canada. Since that time, and certainly during the time of my association with him here, he has thrown himself into his work as a parliamentarian. He put all of his professional qualifications and experience—and his excellent personal qualities of perseverance and integrity—to the service of Parliament and the country. He is greatly to be admired and respected for that. His contribution in this place has always been substantive and valuable.

It is said of Senator Godfrey that he has always given freely of his advice and assistance when requested, and just as freely when not requested. Indeed, he has been known to support me in debate when everyone else had abandoned me—

Senator Frith: He can't be right all the time!

Senator Murray: —and I must say that I acknowledge that fact with considerable gratitude. In fact, on the day of my appointment to this place I happened to be in Cape Breton. I turned on the television set to see Senator Godfrey being interviewed on Canada AM by Gail Scott. She was asking him what he thought of the appointments that had been announced that day. There had been three of us appointed. He replied, “I think Jim Balfour's appointment was an excellent one.” I certainly could not disagree with that. She then went on to ask him whether he did not think it was rather offensive to have appointed such a partisan as Lowell Murray, and he replied that he thought it would turn out badly if I spent most or all of my time working at the organization of the Conservative Party and did not attend to my duties as a parliamentarian. With that admonition ringing in my ears, I came to the Senate in the fall of 1979; I threw myself into the work of the Senate, and so neglected the work of the Conservative Party that we were thrown out of office in the ensuing election.

[Senator Murray.]

In any case, I had the great pleasure of serving with Senator Godfrey on the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, and for a time I was its chairman. He brought to the work of that committee not only excellent experience and qualifications but also an independence of spirit and approach which I believe has helped to produce the excellent reputation which that committee enjoys among parliamentarians, in the business community and in the country.

His work with the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments is well known. The members of that committee held a farewell for him the other night, at which he was eulogized by just about everyone present, including ministers who have felt his wrath as he has toiled so hard to spare the law and the people the burden of onerous and unnecessary, and sometimes confusing, regulation.

Finally, I note his service to this country in wartime as a pilot with the RCAF from 1940 to 1945. Senator Godfrey retired with the rank of Wing Commander.

Honourable senators may be aware that in some houses of debate in the Commonwealth, certain honourable members are referred to not just as “honourable members” but as “honourable and gallant members”. I am very pleased today to salute our friend and colleague as an honourable and gallant member of this place. He is an exemplary citizen of Canada who has served us with such distinction in both war and peace.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Richard J. Stanbury: Honourable senators, the Deputy Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the Government have done such an excellent job of paying tribute to my friend, Jack Godfrey, that I will do no more than associate myself with those remarks. My experience of Senator Godfrey—over, I suppose, 25 years—has been mainly in the cradle of the Liberal Party.

In that capacity, Senator Godfrey has always been a most sincere, active and aggressive Liberal, but he is also what might be called a Liberal-Democrat in the finest sense of the word. He has built a great reputation in the business community, but he has always understood the social responsibilities of business to the people of Canada. He has been courageous to the point of defying some nasty remarks made over the years from people who did not agree with that particular point of view. His courage has been the foundation of a great deal of activity that he and I have shared in the party.

• (1410)

I will not spend time talking about his other activities in support of the arts, and his responsibility in the professional community and the business community. He has simply surpassed all expectations in every field in which he has been engaged.

When I was chairman of the Special Senate Committee on the Constitution a few years ago, I was fortunate to have Senator Godfrey as a valuable member of that committee. I have seen Senator Godfrey's performance at meetings of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs and at meetings of the Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

As the Leader of the Government has said, Senator Godfrey's activities in the Senate have been of great value. We have all benefited tremendously as a result of Senator Godfrey's service to the Senate.

I know that Senator Godfrey will not stop here. He may have reached the age which requires him to leave the Senate, but he has not lost any of his verve or desire to do good things for the Canadian people. I know that we will hear from Senator Godfrey on many occasions in the future.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Godfrey: Honourable senators, I am moved by these very kind remarks. I will miss the Senate. I hate to leave on such a note as disagreeing with the Leader of the Government in the Senate once again, but I must say that I believe in mandatory retirement, that I believe in inter-generational justice, meaning "give way to the younger people." Furthermore, I think I should retire before it becomes apparent to others, as it has become apparent to me, that my faculties are failing me.

I apologize for disagreeing with the Leader of the Government on this occasion, but I do believe that senators should retire at the age of 75.

ROYAL ASSENT

NOTICE

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following communication had been received:

RIDEAU HALL
OTTAWA

25 June 1987

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber today, the 25th day of June, 1987, at 5.30 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to certain Bills.

Yours sincerely,
Léopold H. Amyot
Secretary to the Governor General

The Honourable

The Speaker of the Senate
Ottawa

INFORMATION COMMISSIONER

ANNUAL REPORT TABLED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I have the honour to table the annual report of the Information Commissioner for the period ended March 31, 1987.

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

BILL TO AMEND (ATTENDANCE OF SENATORS)—FIRST READING

Hon. John M. Godfrey presented Bill S-13, to amend the Constitution Act, 1867, (Attendance of Senators).

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Senator Godfrey: With leave, at the next sitting of the Senate. I think I should explain that after doing some legal research on my own, I came to the conclusion that the procedure by way of resolution, which I had originally started, was wrong. That is twice in the day that I have had to say that I was wrong! We should proceed by way of a bill. So, as well as presenting this bill, I want to ask permission to withdraw the motion that I made, which appears as Order No. 11 on the Orders of the Day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Godfrey, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

FORGIVENESS OF CERTAIN OFFICIAL DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE DEBTS

REPORT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-62 TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. George van Roggen: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the subject matter of Bill C-62, relating to the forgiveness of debts incurred or assumed in respect of certain official development assistance loans made by the Government of Canada to the Governments of Togo and the Islamic Republic of Mauritania and also to the former East African Community, in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, has the honour to table its ninth report.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix "A", p. 1418.)

Senator van Roggen: If I may, with leave, honourable senators, I would like to make a few remarks relative to the report of my committee in this respect.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator van Roggen: It was of special interest to members of the committee when we received this particular bill because, while the bill was limited in scope to forgiving comparatively small amounts of debts owing by these countries, it was of significance following so shortly upon the report of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate on Canada's involvement in the international financial institutions and Third World debt. We did not look at the bill too broadly but in the context of all Canadian debt owed by African countries, particularly by the countries of sub-Saharan Africa.

● (1420)

There are one or two things that are not evident in a simple reading of the bill which I think honourable senators will find interesting. First, let me say that the bill discloses that the total forgiveness of debt on this particular occasion is $68 million, and involves Togo, Mauritania, Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda. In 1977 the then government forgave some ODA, Official Development Assistance, debts of 12 least developed countries. I will not bore you with the definition of how these countries qualified. Recently, because of statistical criteria, Togo and Mauritania qualified as least developed countries, and, as a result, Canada is by this bill granting them the same debt relief that was granted in 1977 to others.

Following the dissolution of the East African Community, which was made up of three nations, Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda, Tanzania and Uganda qualified automatically as LDCs, the Canadian government decided to forgive their official debts. While Kenya is not an LDC, the government considered it equitable that as it had shouldered its share of the joint debt of the three, its debt should also be forgiven. In 1986 the government offered a moratorium on repayment of Canadian official development debt for a period of five years, with extensions to the year 2000. This offer was made to all—and I think this is important to underline—all sub-Saharan African countries demonstrating a commitment to undertake necessary economic adjustments. This forgiveness amounted to almost $700 million of which this $68 million now being written off forms part. While the remainder of the some $600 million debt of sub-Saharan African countries remains on the books of Canada as an asset, the terms are so concessionary that, to all intents and purposes, it can be considered as written off. At some point the balance of that debt will have to be dealt with as a budgetary write-off in the same way as the debt involved in this bill. Of course, it will affect the deficit at that time.

In our report we commend the government for the way it is treating the debt of sub-Saharan African countries, both in the moratorium and with regard to previous write-offs. Certainly we commend them for this particular action. The net result of all these actions is that as of today Canada has either forgiven, or all but forgiven through the moratorium, all non-commercial debt of an official nature to sub-Saharan African countries. This is a matter in which, I think, we as a nation can take great pride. It is a matter which we are now pursuing with other creditor governments, through the Venice Summit and by other means, to follow suit and do the same thing for these countries that are really so poor that to expect them to pay their debts is pointless. By this mechanism we at least send a message to these countries to the effect that we will endeavour to see that they are put in the position to pull themselves up by their own boot straps.

The committee had one concern with the bill, and that is the short title, which is "Forgiveness of Certain Official Development Assistance Debts Act." The title does not say what the debt is, to what countries it applies, or even what continent is involved. We suggest that it will be very difficult for any citizen or lawyer going to statute citators in future years, looking to find this particular piece of legislation, to have the slightest idea where it is. We think more care should be given to that aspect in future by the Department of Justice. However, we did not want to send an unfortunate message to these countries by delaying the bill on that account.

We spent considerable time on clause 5 of the bill, which specifically states that the forgiveness of debt in this bill in the amount of $68 million:

... is hereby written off as a budgetary expenditure and deleted from those accounts.

That is, the asset is deleted from the books of government. The significance of that is that it will exacerbate the problem that this government has with its fiscal deficit for this year. We go on to say that we feel that the Auditor General might well take a careful look at the other $600 million or so of debt which is of equal value—namely, all but valueless—which is presently sitting on the books. That debt should also be written off as a budgetary expenditure. It would probably be awkward to do that in one year, and we can understand the government's reluctance to do that. However, if it is sitting on the books as an asset, it is really only smoke and mirrors and should be dealt with in the same fashion.

Honourable senators, this was a pre-study of this bill. I do not believe that this particular bill is on the priority list of the government to be passed before our adjournment at the end of June. If it should come over from the other place before the end of June, however, we see no reason why the members of the Senate could not deal with it here in the chamber rather than referring it back to the committee.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, our report today coincides with the tabling in the other place of a proposed bill respecting the status and use of the official languages of Canada. Some of the committee recommendations are included in the proposed bill and, on behalf of our committee, we are pleased to see that the government has reacted in a most positive way to the work of the committee. It is our hope that the remaining recommendations will be included in the new regulations yet to come.

Therefore, I have the honour to present the Fourth Report of the Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix "B", p. 1420.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Wood: Honourable senators, I move that this report be taken into consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

[Translation]

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, considering the importance of this subject, the time spent preparing this report and all the work done by members on both sides of the house, for which they are to be commended, I would nevertheless like to draw to the attention of this chamber, without wishing to cast a shadow on the historic moment where we have the tabling of this report and of the new bill on official languages in the House of Commons, the fact that during the first four or five sittings of this joint committee, it was very difficult for members of the Senate to get equal time. As far as I am concerned, we see here a negation of the privileges of the members of this chamber. It was not until after several attempts were made and a motion was adopted unanimously, that senators were given the right to the same amount of speaking time as their colleagues in the House of Commons.

Meanwhile, I would like to take this opportunity to report to this chamber that a member of the Senate has been most assiduous and I am referring to Senator Guay. Of course, official languages is a subject that has been of considerable interest to him for many years.

Before I sit down, I would like to draw the attention of this house to something else. On Thursday, in committee, when there was some question of having a press conference very shortly to explain the committee's recommendations—

• (1430)

[English]

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: I rise on a point of order. Is this debatable?

[Translation]

Senator Simard: I think this is a question of privilege, and if Senator Bonnell would care to wait, he may get the answer he is seeking. Mr. Speaker, it took a motion—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, did I understand correctly this is a motion to adjourn the debate?

An Hon. Senator: No.

Senator Frith: No? I thought Senator Wood moved a motion to adjourn the debate. Normally, we don't debate these motions, but we could perhaps clarify the situation by saying that Senator Simard has the Senate's permission to continue. I think that normally, there is no debate on an adjournment motion.

An Hon. Senator: Yes.

Senator Frith: I am ready to give Senator Simard permission to continue, but I think that we have to clarify further whether this is a question of privilege.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, the point raised by Senators Bonnell and Frith is a valid one. I intended to rise on this point as well, but I certainly don't want to offend the sensitivities of Senator Simard, who certainly knows everything there is to know about defending the Official Languages Act. I think we understand each other in this respect.

Obviously, we would have to qualify whether Senator Simard is debating the adjournment motion that the Honourable the Speaker put before the house or whether he intends, for the time being, to speak to Senator Wood's report. It may be he is rising on a point of order or a question of privilege. I think that in the interests of the proceedings of this house, he should qualify the extent of his remarks and tell us whether it is a question of privilege or a point of order. I don't think he can debate the committee's report at this time.

Senator Simard: For the information of honourable senators, I have no intention of discussing the motion. I may have two questions of privilege. I mentioned the first one earlier and I am now coming to the second. If I may, I shall continue.

I referred earlier to what happened last year when Senator Guay, myself and other senators had to take action three or four times about the first problem, which concerns equal rights and equal privileges for senators on a joint committee.

We come now to the second problem. Last Monday, there was a vote about a proposed press conference, and once more the privileges of senators were infringed upon in my opinion. If I may explain, we had been informed that a press conference would be held on Friday following tabling of the report. There were to be three members of the House of Commons, one Conservative, one New Democrat and one Liberal, and only one representative from the Senate. By itself, this might have been viewed as a very secondary matter. However, I think that it is a very good indication that the members of the House of Commons could not care less about the Senate and would prefer us to be content with one representative at press conferences and elsewhere. I object to such an attitude.

After the meeting, since the resolution had been accepted, it seemed to us that the matter had been settled and that both political parties in the Senate would be represented at this press conference. However, such was not the case, Mr. Speaker. One hour after the meeting, I had the pleasure of receiving a telephone call from an assistant clerk, who told me: "Senator Simard, the Conservatives will have to stay at home that day because there are only four chairs, not five, one each for the three members of the House of Commons representing the three political parties and one for Senator Wood". I therefore ask Senator Wood and Chairman Hamelin to solve the chair problem so that both political parties in the Senate as well as the three in the House of Commons, can be represented at such press conferences. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Hon. Joseph-Phillipe Guay: Honourable senators, I am in complete agreement with what Senator Simard has told us since the Senate was represented only by the joint-chairman of the committee.

I think that the Senate should have been represented by both the joint-chairman and a Conservative senator to reflect the two political parties in the Senate. This would have given us two representatives from the members of the committee. The House of Commons had three, the joint-chairman, Mr. Hamelin, Mr. Gauthier from the Liberal Party, and Mr. Epp from the New Democratic Party.

I believe that the question of privilege raised by Senator Simard is well founded and that the Senate should be represented by two of its members in such cases.

On motion of Senator Wood, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-56—AVAILABILITY OF
TRANSLATION

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has completed its pre-study of Bill C-56, but, unfortunately, because of some delay in translation, I ask that later this day, when the report should be ready, I be given leave to revert to Reports of Committees.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Friday, June 26, 1987, at 11 o'clock in the forenoon.

Motion agreed to.

[Senator Simard.]

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE CONSTITUTION

AMENDING PROCESS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, while the Leader of the Government was away he no doubt noticed some reports that the Prime Minister was refusing to alter the Meech Lake agreement. The impression was given that, therefore, the work of the joint committee, the work of any committees in the provinces, legislative work in that regard or, indeed, the work of the committee in the Senate might be considered a waste of time. The impression was also given that the Prime Minister of Canada thought he could ignore the constitutional amending process.

I understand that since that time the Prime Minister has explained that that is not a correct interpretation of what he said. Therefore, I give the Leader of the Government in the Senate an opportunity to explain what the government position is with regard to the amending process under the Constitution in this case.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, in my travels, I, unfortunately, missed the exchanges to which the Deputy Leader of the Opposition refers.

The position of the government is that ten provinces and the Government of Canada have committed to presenting the resolution, in identical form, in two official languages, to their legislatures for passage as it stands. That is the commitment.

Senator Frith: No more than that? That is fine. That is a simple statement of fact.

AGRICULTURE

NEW BRUNSWICK AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND POTATO INDUSTRY—EFFECT OF IMPOSITION OF EXCISE TAX ON POTATO CHIPS

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. It has been almost a year since we had the pleasure of congratulating him upon his appointment as Leader of the Government in the Senate. At that time a number of speakers dwelt on the fact that having a senator from down east, especially from Cape Breton, lead the government troops in the Senate would be a definite advantage. In that spirit, I would like to bring the following matter to his attention. I do so keeping in mind that he is familiar with the problems of the potato industry in New Brunswick, where he spent a good part of his pre-political career—or was it part of the political career?

In any case, the problem is that the New Brunswick Potato Agency—which I believe is also speaking for the potato industry of Prince Edward Island, which is represented here by a number of senators, including Senator Phillips and Senator Bonnell—is gravely concerned about the fact that a 12 per cent excise tax on snack foods will apply, as of July 1, to potato chips. The potato industry had objected to the imposition of this tax at the horticultural council meeting earlier this year, and it has asked parliamentarians of all shades and colours to give the matter one more try. It is with that in mind that I appeal, on their behalf, to the Leader of the Government in the Senate to try to persuade the government not to impose that tax. As I say, it is scheduled to come into effect on July 1 of this year. It will create an additional hardship for an industry that has, for years, been trying to pull itself up by the boot straps out of a very difficult situation.

As the Honourable Leader of the Government knows, there is a serious attempt to try to establish a national potato marketing board—it is an attempt, because it is not an easy exercise—and it is generally felt that this is not the time to tax the potato industry indirectly. The market for potato chips is a substantial one, and this tax could cause grave difficulties for the potato industry.

Very simply put, then, would the Leader of the Government in the Senate bring to the attention of his colleagues, particularly those concerned with regional development and agriculture, the advisability of not imposing that tax at this time because of the serious difficulties facing the potato industry?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will undertake to convey those representations to my colleagues. However, I should state that the government is preoccupied with a number of other problems facing potato farmers generally, and those in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island in particular, and that a decision on those matters is imminent.

As for the effect of the tax on potato chips, knowing something about the product I dare express the opinion that, notwithstanding the added tax, the high quality and excellent productivity of the industry will carry the day.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to take a moment to bring another consideration to the attention of the Leader of the Government in the Senate. The industry would like the government to refocus on the fact that potatoes and the product derived from potatoes is very much a home-grown product. This is what distinguishes potato chips from the rest of the confectionery industry, where most of the input, if not 90 per cent or more, comes from areas outside Canada, and these products include nuts, sugars, raisins, and so on. The potato chips are totally sourced in a wholly Canadian base. Therefore, the industry does not very well understand why the government would zero in on this particular so-called confectionery produce.

This tax will hurt a primary Canadian agricultural resource. Representatives of this industry have no objection to a tax on what the government considers luxury items made up of produce which comes from offshore. But in this case, and considering the circumstances, they think that this tax is a sledge hammer blow to the industry, and they are greatly concerned.

Senator Murray: I shall convey those additional representations of the honourable senator to my colleagues.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, by way of a supplementary question, let me tell the Leader of the Government in the Senate that this is a very important item for Prince Edward Island. The people of Prince Edward Island have only six inches of topsoil and the water around them with which to make a living. They have no mines and they have no industries. The government has now imposed a potato inspection fee and is charging the farmers to dredge the harbours to sell their products. The government does not charge Ontario in the course of the sale of its products.

It is the children that the government is taxing here. It is the little kids—the government is taking 11 cents from a little kid for a bag of chips.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Bonnell: It is bad enough to charge poor, old people for drugs, but for God's sake think of the kids. Then think of the farmers who are going bankrupt every day across this country. It does not make much sense to have one hand giving a subsidy only to have the other hand imposing a tax on the children and the farmers of Prince Edward Island.

I ask the Leader of the Government to stand up and tell the Prime Minister that he is the minister responsible for the Atlantic Development Agency and that he is going to do something!

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I cannot forbear to remark that Senator Bonnell is the first medical doctor I have ever known to promote the consumption of potato chips. I trust that he knows the difference between the potato chip, which is a flake, and the French fry, which is something else. My friend from Prince Edward Island, Senator Phillips, tells me that approximately 250 acres of several hundred thousand acres in Prince Edward Island would be connected with the potato chip manufacturer in particular. In any case, I shall add the representations of the Honourable Senator Bonnell to those we have already heard.

Senator Bonnell: You can do it—keep it up!

Senator Murray: I will bring those representations to the attention of the minister.

WESTERN POTATO INDUSTRY—EFFECT OF IMPOSITION OF EXCISE TAX ON RED POTATO

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question. In western Canada, particularly in Manitoba, we grow what we call the red potato, which is one of the best quality potatoes in Canada. It is used in great quantities by McDonald's—someone in Manitoba is growing an average of 200 acres a year to supply McDonald's.

I hope that in his consideration of those farmers in Prince Edward Island the Leader of the Government will also give consideration to westerners who are in this business. It is very important for those westerners to maintain that business because of the high quality of the potato.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am sorry to think that the Honourable Senator Guay also does not know the difference between a potato chip and a French fry.

Senator Guay: I said "potato chip", in my case.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

PROPOSED ADVISORY COUNCIL—COMPOSITION, ROLE AND TERMS OF REFERENCE—REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. Dalia Wood: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. On May 26 last I asked several questions which were not answered. The honourable senator stated that on the tabling of the proposed bill—namely, an act respecting the status and use of the official languages of Canada—all my questions would be answered. The bill was tabled today, but my questions are still not answered.

• (1450)

According to a press release put out by the Honourable Ramon Hnatyshyn, a Canadian council on official languages will be established to advise on matters relating to the promotion of official languages in the Canadian society.

I would like those questions answered. There are six of them. The Leader of the Government may prefer to provide the answers in written form. I would certainly like them answered.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will see what further information can be conveyed to the honourable senator at this time. I would remind her, however, that the bill, which was tabled in the other place today, will eventually be going to committee. Ministers and officials will be appearing and she will have an opportunity to ask not only those six questions but 60 others, if she so desires.

Senator Wood: As a supplementary, I do not want the council to be formed before we have an opportunity to meet with the minister.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

POSTAL STRIKE—APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government. We are all aware that Canada Post Corporation proposed the appointment of a mediator as a gesture towards settling the current strike.

[Senator Guay.]

I know that Shirley Carr, President of the Canadian Labour Congress, has made a proposal to the government that an umpire should be selected. She has suggested the name of E.B. (Ted) Jolliffe, who has had long experience as chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board.

I am wondering if the Leader of the Government can say whether the government has made a response to what I believe is a very responsible suggestion from the Canadian Labour Congress; and, if so, what is that response?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): No, honourable senators. The government is aware, of course, that Canada Post and the union resumed negotiations this morning for the first time since Friday. We did not appoint a mediator because, in our judgment, the parties were so far apart that the use of a mediator would not have been very useful at this time.

I will inquire as to whether any formal response will be given to the latest representations of the Canadian Labour Congress.

RECOMMENDATION OF CONCILIATOR—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I believe it is correct to say—the Leader of the Government will correct me if I am wrong—that the conciliator, in his report, recommended that Canada Post be given until 1990 to bring Canada Post out of the red. But the government demands that Canada Post shall be out of the red by 1988. It is certainly the feeling of the unions that this is very onerous for Canada Post, and it is really the cause of the tremendous amount of pressure which Canada Post is placing on the unions to accept very drastic changes in their terms of employment, and is therefore the basic cause of the strike.

Is the government giving any consideration to adopting the recommendation to which I have referred?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am not sure that my honourable friend is correct in attributing the present work stoppages and strike to the factors which he has mentioned. I should remind him that the deadline imposed on Canada Post to break even financially has been moved ahead on three occasions since legislation to create the crown agency was introduced in Parliament. It was moved ahead once before proclamation by the previous government. It was moved ahead a second time by the previous government; and it was moved ahead once by the present government. So, there have been three delays granted to Canada Post in that respect.

Notwithstanding that fact, I will see whether there is any further response that needs to be given at this time to the proposal which my honourable friend attributes to the conciliation chairman.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Hazen Argue: Today's issue of the Toronto Star carries a report of statements made by the Prime Minister. In it the Prime Minister is reported as having made the following statement:

I happen to think the post office is pretty much an essential service, and I think most Canadians do, too. But in terms of legal implications, that will be for another day, and for other people to consider in other circumstances.

Is this a threat by the Prime Minister to remove from the postal unions free collective bargaining as we know it? By making this declaration, is he removing the possibility of free collective bargaining?

I do not consider myself to be an authority on many matters, and I am certainly not an authority in any way on labour relations, but it seems to me, in a country which is proud of its freedoms, that part of those freedoms must be the process of free collective bargaining by organized unions; and that, in itself, sets Canada and other democracies apart from many nations today. I hope that the government leader in the Senate can assure me, and other honourable senators, that there is no threat by the government, implied or otherwise, to remove free collective bargaining from the postal union.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I can assure the honourable senator that there is no such threat, intended or implied, in the statements attributed to the Prime Minister. If the honourable senator examines the record of the past two years, he will find that under the present government there has been an excellent record of harmonious labour relations, certainly in the public sector.

THE SENATE

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD—METHOD OF APPOINTMENT OF SENATORS—QUEBEC VACANCIES

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government. He will recall that we have discussed in this chamber on a number of occasions the importance of having Senate vacancies filled quickly. In view of the fact that the Province of Quebec has now officially accepted the Meech Lake accord, which provides for a new method of selection of senators, has the government approached the Province of Quebec for its list from which the government will appoint new senators?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Not yet, honourable senators.

Senator Molgat: Can the Leader of the Government indicate how soon that might be done?

Senator Murray: Not today, honourable senators.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

POSTAL STRIKE—APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government that is supplementary to that asked by Senator Argue with respect to the postal strike. Taking into account the decision of the government not to appoint a mediator for the reasons stated, would the government still be of the view that it would be appropriate to appoint a mediator before back-to-work legislation was contemplated by the government?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Well, honourable senators, the question is quite hypothetical; but I certainly hope and expect that before we had to contemplate legislating people back to work, other attempts would be made to bring the parties to settlement.

POSTAL STRIKE—LABOUR POLICY OF GOVERNMENT

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government took some credit for what he described as good labour relations between the present government and its employees. Does the Leader of the Government consider that a roll-back of a group of employees, who have been no trouble and who, in fact, have been very cooperative with successive governments for many years—who are undertaking daily duties of delivering the mail to homes and businesses—represents good labour policy?

BRITISH COLUMBIA

SOUTH MORESBY—ESTABLISHMENT OF NATIONAL PARK—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, last Tuesday I asked whether the Deputy Leader of the Government could raise with the Leader of the Government a question concerning South Moresby Island. I welcome the renewed discussions between the Prime Minister and the Premier of British Columbia. I wonder if the Leader of the Government in the Senate could enlighten us on what is happening and, in particular, tell us whether, in fact, negotiations are taking place.

• (1500)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I am informed that the Prime Minister and Premier Vander Zalm discussed this matter on Monday evening last, and that discussions are continuing between the two governments. Meanwhile, the very, very generous offer that the federal government made, amounting to some $106 million over a ten-year period, if my memory serves me correctly, is still on the table.

DIEFENBAKER CENTRE, UNIVERSITY OF SASKATCHEWAN

FINANCIAL CRISIS—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, on June 9 I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate about possible federal financial assistance to keep the Diefenbaker Centre at the University of Saskatchewan operational. At that time the Leader of the Government indicated that the government would be giving consideration to some form of assistance.

Officials of the University of Saskatchewan are starting to get very worried. The closure of that important centre is reasonably imminent, and I have been asked to keep questioning the government as to what its plans may be and whether any light may be seen at the end of the tunnel. Perhaps the Leader of the Government in the Senate could give us some information on this matter at this time.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not have very much to add to what has already been stated. The federal government did contribute $300,000 for the construction of the centre. I am told that the Public Archives Canada has been organizing and microfilming the Diefenbaker papers, with a total direct cost of at least $1,200,000.

The honourable senator knows that maintaining the centre is the responsibility of the University of Saskatchewan. However, I am aware that there are serious problems with the Diefenbaker Centre. Those problems have been brought to the attention of the government by my honourable friend and by others and are under consideration.

Senator Buckwold: Honourable senators, is it to be understood that at the moment no financial assistance is being considered for that particular centre?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Right Honourable the Prime Minister has asked the appropriate officials of government to examine what options may exist with regard to this centre and the government's relation with it. That is being done.

DELAYED ANSWER TO ORAL QUESTION CANADA-FRANCE FISHERIES AND BOUNDARIES AGREEMENT

NEGOTIATIONS TO ESTABLISH FISHING QUOTAS IN CANADIAN WATERS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have an answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on June 23, 1987, by the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen, regarding Canada-France Fisheries and Boundaries Agreement—Negotiations to Establish Fishing Quotas in Canadian Waters.

I ask that the answer be taken as read.

The second round of fisheries negotiations, scheduled to take place in Paris on June 24 and 25, was cancelled by the French government. The meeting has not yet been rescheduled. The closure of Canadian ports to French fishing vessels was cited in the French government announcement of the postponement of the June 24-25 negotiating round.

FIJI

CURRENT POLITICAL SITUATION—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, under Delayed Answers some time ago I asked the Leader of the Government in the Senate a question concerning Canada's appraisal of the situation in Fiji. I wonder if before any summer adjournment we could have a response to that question.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Yes, honourable senators.

BELL CANADA BILL

THIRD READING

Hon. Orville H. Phillips, for Hon. William M. Kelly, moved the third reading of Bill C-13, respecting the reorganization of Bell Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

PATENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Cogger, seconded by the Honourable Senator David, for the second reading of the Bill C-22, An Act to amend the Patent Act and to provide for certain matters in relation thereto.—(Honourable Senator Thériault).

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, first of all, I note that my colleague from New Brunswick said yesterday that I was absent for medical reasons and therefore he was adjourning the debate on my behalf. I thank him for that. However, I want to inform my colleagues that my health is good, but, in fact, I had a dental appointment I could not miss.

Honourable senators, in my seven or eight years in the Senate, this will be only the second time for me to use a text when addressing this honourable house. Those colleagues from New Brunswick who are now in the Senate and who were members of the New Brunswick legislature will know that during the 20 years I was a member of that legislature I seldom used a text. The text I am using today is by my standard fairly long. I hope honourable senators will bear with me. I point out that I am using a text because, should this bill become law as it now stands, at least the record will show how deeply I feel about this legislation.

Honourable senators, the government seems to be ready to push Bill C-22 through the Senate. I think it is the duty of all conscientious Canadians to oppose this piece of legislation. Not only will this bill be detrimental to the well-being of Canadian citizens but its intent—that is, to satisfy American multinational pharmaceutical companies—is an outrage.

Bill C-22 proposes to bring us back to the period prior to 1969, the year in which the Liberal government amended the Patent Act to give sick and needy Canadians a break on their drug bills.

Before 1969, Canadians were charged some of the highest drug prices in the world. Since then, the situation has been reversed, and Canadians now pay some of the lowest drug prices in the developed world, thanks to a government that was not coerced into changing this legislation but which acted in the interest of the Canadian people.

Let me trace some of the steps which led to the Liberals amending the Patent Act in 1969.

[Translation]

The Patent Act was established in Canada in 1923. It provided for the issuance of production licences for proprietary drugs. However, it also required that the active ingredients be manufactured here, in Canada. Because of that requirement, the manufacturing in Canada of copied drugs was barely profitable, and the Patent Act remained ineffectual in that area for a number of years.

However, changes became apparent at the end of the 50s and in the 60s. At that time, there was a dramatic change in people's attitudes and government policies toward that industry.

What caused those changes?

First, the publicity surrounding congenital malformations in children of women who used the thalidomide drug during pregnancy, between 1955 and 1961. Second, the findings of the Kefauver Commission in the United States—according to that Commission, the drug industry priced its drugs too high and, moved by the profit motive, often neglected the public's interests, as happened in the case of thalidomide.

A series of Canadian government agencies looked into the question, among which the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission in 1962-63, the Hall Commission in 1964, the Harley Commission in 1966-67.

Having found that Canadian drug prices were among the most expensive in the world, those commissions recommended that patent protection be reduced or even abolished.

The work of those commissions provided a basis for the changes made by the Liberals to the Patent Act. Honourable senators, I was at the time Minister of Health in New Brunswick, and I can state that those changes were welcomed not only by the government I was part of, but by all citizens in New Brunswick who, for the most part, had no health care plan to cover the cost of drugs they absolutely needed.

Over the years, provincial governments increasingly assumed health program funding, covering thereby the costs of drugs for many target groups. Those programs were made possible by the actions of the then government in 1969.

However, many people in my province, and overall more than four million Canadians still have no plan covering the cost of drugs. But thanks to the foresight shown by the Liberal government, they benefit from very low drug costs. Amending the present system by passing Bill C-22 would create a real danger for millions of people, who could no longer afford drugs that are essential to them.

• (1510)

[English]

The amendment of 1969 has, without doubt, been beneficial for all sick Canadians. However, the American multinational drug companies have since cried out against lost profits! Others, such as my colleague, Senator David, in his speech in the Senate on May 13, 1987, spoke "of closures, transfers of laboratories and layoffs of scientists and technicians." They seem to believe, of course, that all of this is directly related to the compulsory licensing that started in 1969. This would appear to be quite shocking.

But let us not deal in generalities; let us delve into the facts. Senator David was no doubt referring to the pull-out of such Montreal-based multinationals as Ayerst, Hoffman-Laroche, Smith/Kline and Pharma-Research, which the Canadian Pharmaceutical Association also blames on the 1969 amendment.

In actual fact, as the Eastman report points out, such failures are limited to those companies that are primarily dependent upon one drug for their continued viability. This was the case with Hoffman-Laroche, which produced Valium, and Smith/Kline, which produced Tagamet. As for Ayerst, the closure of its research laboratories in Montreal was a non-event, since no single new product had been developed by them for many years. All of its sales were via licences from ICI and Beecham, who themselves decided that the Canadian market was lucrative enough to develop their own licences. Also, several of these Montreal-based firms, including Parke-Davis, Robbins, Syntex and the above mentioned, actually left Montreal, not to move from this country but to relocate in Toronto, proving that the 1969 amendment had nothing to do with the so-called "pharmaceutical crisis" in Quebec.

In terms of consumer savings, the Eastman report estimates that Canadians saved $170 million on pharmacy sales through compulsory licensing in 1983 alone—"a figure that rises to $211 million when sales to hospitals are included." In 1986 the estimated saving is $500 million.

A study by the University of Toronto Faculty of Medicine has found that there is a 20 to 25 per cent saving by substituting for brand name drugs their generic equivalents. These figures are based on actual savings. The study demonstrated that much greater potential savings could be achieved if even lower cost products were substituted.

The 1969 amendment was an important factor enabling provincial governments, such as that of New Brunswick, to set up drug reimbursement programs for the sick.

In my province this type of program has included substitution of multisource drugs or interchangeable drugs since November 1984 only. Due to a low percentage of drugs actually substituted, the saving resulting from this program in the first year was minimal, but the substitution rate was up 22 per cent in 1986, and savings went up as well. In 1987, the figures currently available indicate a substitution rate of 52 per cent, and a 100 per cent increase is predicted in the amounts saved during the substitution of brand name drugs by generic equivalents.

First of all, with Bill C-22, New Brunswick would lose the money it has been saving through substitution. Second, the New Brunswick Conservative Health Minister, Nancy Clark Teed, pointed out that in addition to the loss of savings to the New Brunswick government, the government will have to pay for more costly drugs, and so will be doubly penalized. The federal Conservatives may gain the gratitude of the multinational drug companies, but the citizens of New Brunswick will pay the costs.

To paint a more vivid picture of the type of savings that compulsory licensing has allowed countrywide, let us look at two examples.

The drug Amoxicillin, one of the newest antibiotics, currently costs more than 30 cents per tablet for a 250 milligram dose of the brand name drug, while the generic equivalent costs 12 cents per tablet for the same dosage.

Diazepam is the generic equivalent for Valium. In 1982, according to data prepared by the CDMA, there was a consumer saving of $8,440,000 when compared to the originator's price. The same year the hospital savings amounted to approximately $2 million. Compulsory licensing saved Canadians, through hospitals or otherwise, $10 million in one year on one drug alone.

[Translation]

The list of generic drugs which have enabled Canadians to save millions of dollars is long. According to the Eastman Commission report, the amendment to the Patent Act which made these savings possible is also responsible for the strong growth of the wholly-owned Canadian generic drug industry. But what happened to the American multinationals through all this? Did Canadians save at the expense of the supposedly deserved profits of these multinationals?

Let us refer to Dr. Eastman's study in which he indicates very clearly that the 1969 amendments to the Patent Act did not have a disastrous impact on the profits of the major multinationals.

I quote:

It is quite clear that the profitability of the Canadian drug industry is relatively high and that it has remained stable throughout the period from 1968 to 1982. The profitability of the drug industry clearly exceeds that of all other manufacturing industries. In addition, the profits of the drug sector are more stable than those of other sectors.

My friends, the Conservatives are trying to change our licence system which has made it possible to gain many benefits for all Canadians, while at the same time even enabling the foreign multinationals to make handsome profits. Why would they want to change the system? They reply that it is a matter of research and development.

[English]

The Honourable Senator David commented in a speech before this house that pharmaceutical industries restricted their investment in Canada after 1969. However, once again he failed to bring evidence to support his allegation. When we look at the actual facts, we see that this allegation is indeed unfounded. The ratio of R&D spending to sales has remained quite stable since 1969. In fact, from 1967 to 1982 the dollar amounts expended on R&D in Canada increased by 448 per cent, from $10 million in 1969 to $57 million in 1982. Dr. Eastman states that "it is difficult to detect a major change in the trend of R&D that could be associated with the date of any impact of changes in compulsory licensing." Of course, the level of R&D in Canada has never been high. All will agree. However, compulsory licensing has clearly had nothing to do with that fact. The pharmaceutical industry in Canada is dominated by foreign multinationals who, for reasons of efficiency, tend to centralize their research activities at home. As stated by Roy Davidson, a public consultant:

The compulsory licensing provisions cannot have had a substantially negative effect on the profitability of conducting R&D in Canada because basic and applied research activities are undertaken to develop new products for sale in the world market, and not simply to develop new products for sale on the 2 per cent fraction that is the Canadian share that the market represents.

The fact that compulsory licensing might reduce the profitability of a subsidiary in Canada in a given case is irrelevant to a decision about investment in research in Canada.

[Translation]

It is definitely not by granting U.S. multinationals a monopoly — as is the case with Bill C-22 — that we will increase the R&D rate in Canada. Senator David, whom I am again quoting, as well as several others within the Conservative Party, insist that in view of the large number of competing multinationals, Bill C-22 will not result in the creation of monopolies. The Commission of Inquiry on the Pharmaceutical Industry does not share that view. It explains at page 346 of its report that in spite of some elements of competition in the pharmaceutical industry, and I quote:

Monopoly resides in the differentiation of the firm's products from those of others by trade name and by physical or therapeutic characteristics. This differentiation gives firms considerable freedom in setting prices.

This lack of competition in the drug industry is also the result of the very structure in itself of the therapeutic drug market. First, the demand for drugs is "unflexible" in relation to the prices, for a number of reasons. For instance, when a doctor prescribes a drug, he is not concerned with its price since he is not the consumer. Also, the patient who buys the drugs on his prescription does so under fairly urgent circumstances in which health considerations override price considerations. Health insurance systems, whether private or public, have also helped minimize price considerations at the consumer level by reimbursing the cost of those drugs.

This is all readily apparent in the huge drug price increase this year, amounting to 15.4 per cent. A study of the United States Congress has shown that in the past two years, the price of prescribed drugs has increased four times as much as the inflation rate. According to the chairman of the subcommittee dealing with that matter, Senator Henry Waxman, that price increase was not the result of excessive of R&D costs incurred by multinationals. This is what he says:

[English]

I think the pharmaceutical industry is trying to charge whatever the market will bear. They see that with many of their products, the public has no other choice [but to pay]. What is going on . . . is greed on a massive scale.

[Translation]

By removing the competitive element provided by generic drugs in the industry, Bill C-22 will undoubtedly result in a huge price increase. Conservative members claim that their drug prices review board will prevent this from happening. However, we already have ample evidence that that board would not have the clout required to prevent those mark-ups. Moreover, although the Conservatives insist that they would not allow the prices of drugs to rise beyond reasonable limits, those prices would be compared with the prices in other industrialized countries. Are the Conservatives realizing that they would indeed encourage a substantial price increase by doing so? Drug prices are much higher in most other countries of the world than the prices prevailing in Canada presently.

How will Canadians be affected by the implementation of Bill C-22 and the ensuing price rise?

First of all, all Canadians will have to pay more taxes to subsidize this price increase; that is quite clear. The amounts required of Canadians will be enormous, in spite of the federal grant coming from the $100 million in taxes to the provinces to pay the costs of medicine, even if they say on the one hand that there will be no increase, they say on the other that they are prepared to pay $100 million. They recognize, therefore, that there will be price increases.

The Ontario government feels that this amount will not be enough. According to its calculations, it will need 40 per cent more than the amount allocated by the federal government to pay its future costs for medicine.

Denis Psutka, Assistant Deputy Minister responsible for Ontario emergency help services and special programs, noted before our committee that the costs resulting from Bill C-22 could reach up to $1.6 billion over the next 10 years.

In British Columbia, the situation is even more serious. In anticipation of the price increase which will follow the implementation of Bill C-22, the provincial government has already reduced the insurance coverage on drug prices. Moreover, it has increased by nearly 40 per cent the deductible amount on insurance policies.

[English]

Not only will Canadians as taxpayers be hit hard by the climbing drug prices caused by Bill C-22 but some Canadians will be hit hard twice. I am speaking of the 15 per cent, or the more than four million Canadians, who have no insurance coverage that will allow them to pay for increased prices. I am worried about all these people, and particularly worried about the fishermen, the woodworkers, the farmers and those of my province who would be devastated by any illness if they were subjected to prices beyond their means for drugs they desperately need. I know of what I speak when I talk about the cost of drugs. If my own costs for drugs were not covered by some insurance program, it would be enough to put an average man in a very bad situation.

• (1530)

These are not the only people who will suffer. Even those who are covered by government and private insurance programs will be affected. Dr. Hugh Twomey, Minister of Health in Newfoundland in a Conservative government, has said of Bill C-22, and I quote:

The proposals and the potential they have to increase the cost of drugs over the coming years will further restrict any efforts this province might be able to undertake to enhance current programs, either by making benefits more generous to those who are now covered, or to extend coverage to more beneficiaries.

In Nova Scotia the Minister of Health of that province put a freeze on new health care programs after Bill C-22 was introduced. This was no coincidence.

The Atlantic provinces, including New Brunswick, will be amongst the hardest hit by Bill C-22, and they will receive nothing in return for their hardship, as the jobs promised by the government, even if they did materialize, would mostly go to where the Canadian pharmaceutical industry is concentrated, usually Ontario and Quebec.

[Translation]

The deal which this Conservative government is proposing by adopting Bill C-22 is so bad that all Canadians are wondering what convinced it to do that.

The Mulroney government mentioned the creation of 3,000 jobs for highly qualified scientific personnel in addition to a high level of research and development in Canada. However, a document prepared by Minister Harvie Andre himself suggests that only 1,700 of these jobs could be classified as professional. Out of these 3,000 so-called top quality positions, there may be some for cleaners and janitors.

As far as research and development is concerned, it is clear, as I said previously, that it is not Bill C-22 which will increase its level in Canada. We have nothing but promises and commitments from the pharmaceutical industry which has never proved quite reliable. There is nothing in Bill C-22 itself which could compel it to meet its commitments.

[English]

If "high quality" job creation and increased R&D will not result from Bill C-22, what could have pushed the government to propose this bill? In my humble opinion, the answer is not very hard to find.

In 1985, at the Quebec City Summit, the topic of patent protection was persistently brought up by President Reagan as a major point of contention between the U.S. and Canada. Prime Minister Mulroney, who displayed quite a conciliatory mood during this summit, promised to cooperate.

In 1986, a report from the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative states, on page 55, that:

The United States continues to raise its concerns at senior [Canadian] government levels. It urges speedy submission of modifying legislation to address serious U.S. concerns about the inadequacy of Canadian patent protection in the pharmaceutical area.

In June of 1986, it was obvious the Mulroney government had caved in to the U.S. pressure when the first draft of Bill C-22 was made public. However, the U.S. multinationals and the U.S. government made it clear that the changes had not gone far enough.

Therefore, in October 1986 a new draft was proposed, and changes favourable to the American multinationals had been made at the expense of ordinary Canadians. Interestingly enough, the former chairman of the American drug lobby, Joe Stettler, knew about the changes a full week before public disclosure of the new draft. He said he had received this information from the PMAC in Ottawa. It became obvious that the Mulroney government had largely consulted officials of the brand name industry in order to arrive at the new draft of a bill which was beneficial to the latter.

Following these accusations, the Honourable Harvie Andre contended that all groups had been consulted in the preparation of the second draft. However, Andrew Cohen of the Consumers' Association of Canada, a group Mr. Andre explicitly stated had been consulted, says his association has never been consulted. It would therefore seem that the legislative package was arrived at through discussions with the multinational drug companies and possibly the U.S. government.

Ever since the production of the new draft of Bill C-22, the Mulroney government has been using it as a chip in the bargaining over a free trade agreement with the United States; it has used as a bargaining chip with the Americans the health and welfare of many Canadians.

The government has replied that this is not so; that Bill C-22 and the topic of patent protection has never been part of the negotiations. Yet, a memorandum to Congressmen from the U.S. chief negotiator in the free trade talks, Peter Murphy, leaked to the Toronto Star, shows that Bill C-22 is, in fact, a very important part of the negotiations under way. It contained the following paragraph:

[Senator Thériault.]

Intellectual property is another priority item for the U.S. In these negotiations we are trying to convince Canada that it is in our mutual interest over the long run to strengthen IP—meaning, intellectual property—

protection. We have put together a draft text, reviewed by our private sector and we will use this as a basis for the negotiations. We have also indicated that we are not satisfied with Canadian compulsory licensing of pharmaceuticals or the lack of copyright for cable re-transmissions and that these must be resolved to have an agreement.

In light of all this, it is quite obvious that the government is being pressured by the Americans to pass this legislation.

[Translation]

I note that in the Senate on May 12, 1987, Senator Cogger had stated that Bill C-22 is based on two principles: the first was that scientists would be rewarded for their efforts; the second was that the protection offered would not result in excessive price increases. But there are provisions in the Canadian legislation to reward scientists: the royalties paid to them by generic drug companies. Perhaps the level of these royalties should be raised? But the duration of exclusivity should not be extended as much as suggested by the government.

The Eastman report is quite clear on this point. It shows that drug companies can recover their research and development costs within a period of 4 to 5 years. As to the second principle of this bill, it is clear that the government will not be able to maintain prices at a reasonable level, as promised.

[English]

Why is it necessary to proceed to a major overhaul of the present system when it has benefited Canadians and pharmaceutical companies alike? Why would the Conservatives proceed to make changes to a system which is used as a model worldwide and which is presently being studied by the U.S. Congress as an alternative to their own system? The director of the EEC's Consumer Association, Tony Venables, echoes our questions by saying:

We are astonished that Canada is preparing to do away with a patent system for pharmaceuticals that is undoubtedly the best of any now in existence in the developed world.

In my humble opinion, the reason for these changes is clear enough: The Mulroney government is caving in to pressure from the American multinationals and the U.S. administration; pressure that had been brought to bear on the previous government in 1969, but which was resisted in the interests of all Canadians.

In closing, honourable senators, I want to say that I was proud to be a member of the Special Committee on the Subject Matter of Bill C-22. It afforded me the pleasure of getting to know better some of my colleagues from both sides of the house. I must say that they are good people to be with.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Thériault: We travelled across this country, but we did not travel to all parts of the country. We did not have time. There are millions of people out there who would like to make their views known to the government on the subject matter of this bill. When I had an opportunity to question the witnesses who appeared before the committee, I usually began or ended my questioning by saying:

We are senators; we are not elected. If the Senate decides to amend or to reject this bill, would you support the Senate? Do you believe that it could be accepted?

Honourable senators, almost unanimously the answer came back: "You are our last hope; please do something on our behalf. You are part of the Parliament of Canada, and you have a right to do things. You are the only hope we have."

● (1540)

Another comment I often heard, which has been used before, was: "If it ain't broke, why fix it?" Few people who appeared before us supported this bill.

I personally feel strongly about this bill, and I hope that the Senate in its wisdom will not allow this legislation to become effective without further participation of the people of Canada, additional study, and the possibility of proposing some amendments. It is impossible for me to accept Bill C-22 as it is.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Michel Cogger: Honourable Senators—

[Translation]

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I must inform the Senate that if the honourable Senator Cogger speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the second reading of Bill C-22.

Senator Cogger: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Honourable senators, I listened carefully Tuesday last to the remarks of our colleague Senator Buckwold and those of senator Bonnell, the chairman of the Special Committee on the Subject Matter of Bill C-22. I also carefully listened a while ago to the comments of Senator Thériault.

In all cases, it appears to me that the Senate obtained some detailed and well-supported statement which, unfortunately, only reflected part of the reality. They saw perhaps the proceedings of the committee through tinted spectacles. Allow me to add the other dimension with both colours accurately focused. We will thus obtain perhaps a better image of reality.

I would like to take a few minutes of our time this afternoon to note some highlights that, in some cases, were raised in all three of the above-mentioned statements.

In the first place, one of the first questions was raised by Senator Buckwold on Tuesday last. Moreover, it was also underlined by Senator Thériault.

[English]

"Why the necessity now to proceed to a major overhaul?" The answer to that, honourable senators, appears to me to be rather simple, if one would care to look at the facts. It is the very conclusion of Dr. Harry Eastman, appointed by a Liberal administration in 1983. That is one of the reasons why it appears pretty obvious that substantial changes to the system ought to be brought in.

Senator MacEachen: Everything begins with the Liberals!

[Translation]

Senator Cogger: The question ignores the recommendations of the Eastman report. It is said subsequently that this is supposed to be a very simple matter and it is all just part of the whole free trade puzzle. Here again I think the answer is definitely out of touch with reality. Coming from senators who are very much my seniors in this chamber I think the reply conveniently ignores the facts. And it conveniently ignores the fact that the previous administration firmly intended to table in Parliament Bill C-22 or a similar piece of legislation.

Interestingly, when Mrs. Erola, a member of the previous government, appeared before the committee on May 5 of this year, she said in reply to the following question:

[English]

Was it indeed the intention of the former administration to proceed with a bill similar to this, which expands the period but which gives protection to the consumer?

Mrs. Erola: Yes.

Having said that, why are we back here listening to senators ask why it is necessary to change? It appears to me that the answer resides partially in the Eastman report and partially in Mrs. Erola's answer.

This whole situation about undue pressure by the United States, and whatnot, again only gives a small portion of the answer. When the Honourable Harvie Andre appeared before our committee, in his exposé, or in answer to a question, he clearly indicated that the United States is pressuring us to change our patent legislation, but so is the United Kingdom, so is Germany, so is France, so is Switzerland and so is Italy, just to mention those few. To my knowledge, we are not negotiating free trade with any of those other nations, yet, there is a pressure on Canada to improve its own patent legislation to bring it in line with that of its trading partners.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, we heard, it was in fact one of the favourite sentences of Senator Thériault when we were travelling with the committee, the following comment which often recurred:

[English]

"If it ain't broke, why fix it?"

[Translation]

Honourable senators, here again, we have the same reply. Dr. Eastman reaches the same conclusion:

[English]

It must have been broke somewhere, because he recommends that we fix it.

[Translation]

Honourable senators, we are told and we have heard this many times that Canadians are concerned about the price of drugs. And why should they not be? According to a survey the committee received from the Nova Scotia Union of Government Employees, they are in favour of protection and, in fact, increased protection of intellectual property, to benefit the innovator, including drug innovators.

This means that the situation is not as clear-cut as some representations would have us believe. Our fellow Canadians are honest and upstanding people. They do not want to steal the fruits of other people's labours. If we are talking only about protecting intellectual property, whether it is reasonable to offer that protection and whether it is reasonable to remunerate or compensate the innovator, they agree. It is clear they are concerned about the impact on eventual costs.

If there is something on which evidence was unanimous it is this: almost all witnesses expressed the hope to the committee that the price review board would be a powerful, efficient agency vested with all the powers needed to exercise real control.

I think that even opponents of the bill will confirm my suggestion that virtually in all cases a strong, efficient, solid, serious price control board is hoped for, with the teeth needed.

As it seems to me, that virtually unanimous hope could be the subject of a specific recommendation to the government, concurrent with the passing of Bill C-22.

Honourable senators, one conclusion I draw from our travels across Canada is that the debate on that matter was often confused, emotional and concerned.

Some data are now well known to committee members. They probably deserve to be reintroduced at this point. Item No. 1 is this: Clearly, the introduction of a generic copy of a drug results in a proportional price reduction. I think the evidence heard before the committee seems unanimous on this. I do not think anyone wants to question that.

Item No. 2 is the following: Of all the drugs now available on the Canadian market, only 7 per cent in numbers are copied, produced under compulsory licence. Therefore, they are price competitive. On the other hand, the current situation is such that even if, under the act, they can be generically copied, 93 per cent of drugs now offered on the Canadian market are subject to no price control or monitoring, certainly not through competition because there is none, certainly not by a price review board because it is only a proposal.

Item No. 3 is: the cost of drugs accounts for 5 per cent at the most of the cost of health services. This was also unquestioned evidence before the committee.

Therefore, assuming Bill C-22 is enacted, the generic drug industry can go on operating with all it now has on the market. Second, it can go on operating, with of course a waiting period before going to the market, the period provided for the innovator's protection.

Assuming always that Bill C-22 is implemented, the 93 per cent of drugs that are now the subject of no control of competition whatsoever will from now on be subject to control and monitoring by the federal commission. I emphasized earlier that all witnesses hoped for that board's establishment. In fact, they wished it would be powerful, efficient and given serious tools.

Let us look for a moment at the respective roles of the industries involved. I heard, as you did, Tuesday last Senator Buckwold suggest, and I quote:

● (1550)

[English]

"Honourable senators, I look at my own province of Saskatchewan that is ready to support this bill." He then goes on to say that the best prescription drug plan in Canada in which there is universal coverage is in Saskatchewan.

Let us look at the other view. There was put before the committee a document signed by Mr. Waschuk, who is the executive director of the prescription drug plan of Saskatchewan. He was responding to a witness, and we asked him to file the letter. This is what he has to say:

Responding firstly to your last question: "Is it realistic to think that generic drugs could some day cover the full range of prescription drugs?", the answer is no. Generic manufacturers, because they do not undertake new product research, nor intend to do so, concentrate only on those products which are most widely used, and most easily reproduced.

That is a statement of the gentleman from the prescription drug plan of Saskatchewan. He goes on to say—

Hon. Sydney L. Buckwold: Would the honourable senator permit a question?

Senator Cogger: If I could, I would finish with this document. He goes on to say:

It is not conceivable that this will change significantly in the future... There is no question that of the new products to be developed for treatment of yet unsolved diseases, the generic industry will not contribute. It is the innovative sector which will discover these products.

Senator Buckwold?

Senator Buckwold: I thank Senator Cogger for permitting me to ask a question. He referred to evidence of Saskatchewan, my home province; otherwise, I would not have interrupted. I think the honourable senator would agree that in the same evidence that was presented to us the response of the department that controls the prescription drug services indicated that over 50 per cent of the drugs that had been prescribed in the province of Saskatchewan overall could have been generic. It seems to me that that is the major point in question. In other words, if doctors had insisted on generics, half of the drugs in the province of Saskatchewan would have been generic. Perhaps Senator Cogger could respond to that, in light of what he presented previously.

Senator Cogger: I thank Senator Buckwold. I like to have all, not just half, of the evidence, and he is quite right. I said earlier in French that, admittedly, I do not think one member of the committee would suggest that the introduction of generic drugs has not resulted in a lower price. That is true, but that is not the point I am making.

I am making the point that, as Mr. Waschuk in Saskatchewan says, the generic industry will not contribute to new products for treatment of yet unsolved diseases. It is the innovative sector which will discover these products. That is the point I was making.

Senator Buckwold: I don't think that is any world-shattering statement.

Senator Cogger: It has a bearing on the whole thing, senator, because essentially what we have to look at is this: There is evidence to the effect that drugs constitute approximately 5 per cent of the total bill of health care. On the other hand, keeping one single Canadian out of hospital for one single day probably means saving several times the average Canadian's yearly drug bill. In view of some of those factors, is it not reasonable for the government to seek to encourage research through added protection for the innovator while bringing all drugs under some measure of price control? When I say "all drugs," I mean especially that 93 per cent which currently is free of competition and free of any sort of surveillance and control. I suggest, honourable senators, that the answer is, indeed, yes, it is reasonable. I further suggest that Bill C-22 may not be perfect legislation but it is good legislation.

Some senators will have read the report submitted on Tuesday by our chairman. I would like to offer a few words of caution in this respect. I would first like to caution against the numbers game. I think we must be careful about statements that place importance on hearing more witnesses in a certain place who represent more people, and that kind of thing. Without being facetious, let me suggest that if anyone, before we left, doubted that there are more consumers in this country than there are researchers, we can prove it beyond the shadow of a doubt. However, I think we knew that before we went away and spent 315,000 bucks.

Nevertheless, I believe it is not the role of the committee to total up evidence. That would be too simple. I believe that committees have to weigh evidence; they have to look at it. They have to look at the seriousness of the evidence, and where it comes from. Otherwise, it is just as though a judge said, "I think I will find in favour of the accused, because more people spoke on his side."

Let me give a further example. This concerns the committee's visit to Quebec City. It sounds nice for the gallery when someone says, "We are here representing the Quebec Association of Consumers." They are good people. We listened to them and we asked them some questions. They represent 220,000 people. That's fine. But what about the unanimous resolution of the Quebec National Assembly, which is unanimous in its support of the bill? It seems to me that the National Assembly represents seven million Quebecers.

Another piece of evidence, which I believe no one would question, is that scientific research in this country is in very sad shape. It is rapidly deteriorating. I do not believe there is one university, school of medicine, school of pharmacy, or scientific institution which did not come to beg, pray, or implore for the passage of this bill. Perhaps there are fewer pharmacists than consumers, but they ought to be heard, as well as pharmacologists, researchers and universities—indeed, the entire community.

I pray, honourable senators, that we will not rely on sheer numbers, on the total amount of evidence. This merit-in-numbers game, or a totalling up of evidence, is—let's face it—a form of consumerism, and is not in keeping with the role of the committees of the Senate. It is a form of abdication of their responsibilities. It is a form of throw back to a mode of referendum. When we are faced with a difficult piece of legislation we should not say, "We will put a committee on the road; here is a difficult piece of legislation;" and when the committee comes back we say: "More people don't want it, so let us not have it."

As I say, that would be an abdication of responsibility on the part of legislators. It is not what we are supposed to do here and, it seems to me, is foreign to good government and sound administration. I suppose one can only imagine what would have happened to castor oil if they had polled the children first; or, for that matter, what would happen to this chamber if the question were raised with enough Canadians.

[Translation]

Before concluding, I wish to appeal directly to the other Quebec representatives in this house. There, perhaps more than anywhere else, the evidence was unanimous. They supported the bill without qualification, beginning with the National Assembly, the Montreal Urban Community, the Board of Trade and the Conference of Mayors of Suburban Municipalities.

I call upon the senators who are, like me, Quebec representatives to keep in mind that overwhelming evidence. It is not only overwhelming but it is also serious and unanimous. It will have to be remembered when the time comes to make a decision. It seems to me that the stake is too high to reject the bill on strictly political considerations. Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask the sponsor of the bill a question having to do with the effective date of the legislation? Do the provisions of the bill come into effect on proclamation, or on the passage of the bill, or do they come into effect at some date stated within the bill?

Senator Cogger: I do not want to mislead the honourable senator. I believe it is right to say that the legislation will come into force upon its passage. However, there are certain transitional dispositions with reference to certain drugs for which compulsory licences have already been applied.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, it is moved by the Honourable Senator Cogger, seconded by the Honourable Senator David, that this bill be now read the second time. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

[Translation]

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Pursuant to the order of the Senate passed on April 2, 1987, the bill is referred to the Special Senate Committee on the Subject Matter of Bill C-22.

[English]

PATENT EXTENSION (ASPARTAME) BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Orville H. Phillips moved the second reading of Bill C-259, to extend the term of a patent relating to a certain additive.

He said: Honourable senators, on June 18, in a rare display of unanimity, the House passed Bill C-259, a private member's bill, which extends for a period of five years the patent protection on a food additive "Aspartame", commonly called NutraSweet.

Honourable senators may ask why there should be an extension in this fashion. The firm producing NutraSweet received approval from the U.S. government in 1974. However, before marketing could begin in that country, the permission was withdrawn. Honourable senators will recall that at that time a number of food additives, such as the cyclamates and saccharines, were considered to be carcinogenic. That finding has now been reversed, and those products are now marketed as food additives.

In 1981 the Searle Company, following a complete and thorough investigation of the product, received permission to market the product in Canada. However, as a result of the delayed approval in the United States, the company states that it has had patent protection for only six years.

The company has asked for and received an extension of the patent protection in Great Britain, Australia and South Africa. The company had made a proposal to construct a $10 million plant in La Salle, Quebec, where it hoped to reduce the amount of import of NutraSweet and possibly market the product in foreign countries.

Honourable senators, I do not pretend to be an authority on the Patent Act and its provisions. Honourable senators, I am sure, have a number of questions, and I therefore propose that the bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce.

Hon. John B. Stewart: I wonder if Senator Phillips would take a question?

Senator Phillips: Yes.

[Senator Cogger.]

Senator Stewart: I realize that he has said that he is not fully cognizant of all questions concerning the Patent Act, but perhaps, if I put the question to him now, he can have an answer ready for later.

● (1610)

I read in the 20th Edition of May that a public bill is founded on "reasons of state policy." We have here a public bill, that is, a bill founded on "reasons of state policy."

I suppose that over the years other companies have sought extensions of the terms of their patents. I wonder if, in view of the fact that the government supported this bill in the other place and is sponsoring it here, there is implied any change in state policy. Is what is being done in this instance consistent with what has been done in other instances in the recent past?

That is the question on which I should like some information.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I have no knowledge of any precedents. I will ask the member who sponsored the bill in the other place to attempt to obtain those precedents and provide the information at the committee meeting.

Again, I point out that this is a private bill, not a government bill.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I would think that the Senate would exercise sober second thought with regard to this bill. I think the Senate would be fully justified if it decided to defeat this bill or to otherwise hobble the provisions of this bill. It is clear that the government is really on the side of the multinationals, that it is doing everything in its legislative authority to entrench patent rights and, in this case, to extend patent rights.

I am absolutely amazed that the members of the three political parties in the other place engaged in a concerted effort to extend the patent right of a particular company. I wonder what happened to the members of the New Democratic Party and their policy of reform, change and control over the multinationals.

Senator Flynn: You left!

Senator Argue: The members of the New Democratic Party are checking the polls, but they are not checking to see what the people stand for; they are checking to see what corporations stand for. That party will stand well with everybody if it can put everybody to sleep.

Thank goodness most honourable senators are not asleep. This bill was slipped through the House of Commons when the members of that House were having a siesta. Those great socialists and great reformers put their stamp of approval on this bill.

Senator Nurgitz: What about the Liberals?

Senator Argue: I mentioned the three political parties. Just because members of the three political parties were there together does not necessarily make it correct.

If a majority of honourable senators see a wrongdoing taking place—and I do not apologize for the fact that the majority of honourable senators are Liberals—then I hope they would try to prevent the indiscretions of the members of the House of Commons. If ever there was a time for sober second thought it is with respect to a piece of legislation such as this. I get disturbed not only when I see legislation such as this, but also when I see a bill such as that which has just received second reading by the Senate, on division, because these bills entrench patent rights.

Senator Flynn: The debate on the other bill is over; you cannot criticize it.

Senator Argue: But this debate is not over. It is very pertinent to talk about the principle of whether or not patent rights should be increased, and I say that if it is wrong with regard to this bill, it was wrong with regard to the bill we just read the second time, on division.

The Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture brought in a report which recommended reducing patent rights from 17 years to 4 years on chemicals used by the farming industry. Parliament—but the government in this case, because it is the leader—is going in the direction of extending, entrenching and solidifying patent rights for the multinational corporations. Farmers have been paying through the nose for years because of patent rights. They are paying through the nose today. Furidan, an insecticide, costs American farmers $26 per unit in Canadian money; a Canadian farmer pays $42.50 per unit. Banvil, a herbicide, costs American farmers in Canadian dollars $35 per unit; a Canadian farmer pays $47 per unit.

Not only are the consumers, the elderly and all of those others who have been mentioned heretofore opposed to any extension of patent rights that soak them and put big profits in the hands of multinationals, but the very survival of the agricultural industry, with chemicals being such a high-cost item, is at stake when Parliament considers patent legislation.

I hope that when we go on the side of generic drugs and generic NutraSweet we also go on the side of generic chemicals for agriculture, because this country and its consumers are hostages to the multinational corporations. They are extortionists in the greatest possible sense of the word. If you were to take 2-4D as an example of a farm chemical, that product was very expensive when it first came on to the market, but when the patent expired many years later, it became one of the cheapest products available on the market.

There are hundreds of thousands of farmers interested in the direction Parliament goes with this bill, and the direction in which it went on the previous bill.

There are those who say—and I am certainly not one of them—that because senators are appointed they do not have any authority or moral right to interfere, to change or modify anything that comes before them from the House of Commons. But we have in this country another body, the judiciary. The wisdom of the judiciary, especially after constitutional amendments, will decide whether the country goes in one direction or in another, but the judiciary is beyond criticism, it is independent because it is made up of judges. If one looks the judiciary over, there is probably a larger percentage of former politicians on the bench than there is in this chamber; sometimes those summoned to the Senate come from outside the judicial system. If honourable senators want to know what is wrong with political parties, it is that there are too many lawyers in them.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Argue: I have been around for some time and know that lawyers make up the majority of membership in some executive bodies. They attend meetings and make speeches, but do little of the leg work. They are all looking forward to becoming judges, they get involved ostensibly for the good of the country, but they always seem to make the list for judicial appointments.

When politicians are appointed to the Supreme Court of Canada, or to any other court, everyone automatically says that they then become fully independent; if a person is appointed to the Senate and has a measure of independence, then the conventional wisdom is that that person should not use that measure of independence or independent judgment.

● (1620)

I am glad that senators have a measure of independence! There may be a new type of Senate when these lists are approved—and it may be a bunch of politicians from the provinces instead of the people we have here now—but I make no apologies for saying that we should use independent judgment in this place. I have never heard from a voter a criticism of a senator taking a position that seems to be in the interests of the Canadian public, and I think that is what we can do today.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Will Senator Argue permit a question?

Senator Argue: Of course!

Senator Flynn: Will you attend the hearings of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce on that bill and put questions to the people who appear there? Will you bring your irrelevancy to the committee?

Senator Argue: I am happy to attend committees, and I think I do pay attention

You can talk about irrelevancy all you like, and you can put your own interpretation on it. Most of your interruptions are quite irrelevant, but today is the exception to your own rule! I think I exercise my prerogatives around here. I can tell you that to be an active member in the chamber does not require attendance at all committee meetings, but I attended the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee when they were dealing with the banks coming down and getting billions of dollars—

Senator Flynn: Will you come tomorrow?

Senator Argue: —even though I was not a member.

Senator Flynn: But will you come tomorrow?

Senator Argue: I hope I can be there; I hope you are there.

Senator Flynn: I certainly will be there. I will wait for you there; we will see whether you can put an intelligent question or not.

Senator Argue: Very nice.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Argue: My honourable friend has learned nothing since his House of Commons days.

Senator Flynn: You have not changed a bit since I knew you in 1958 when you were the Leader of the CCF Party and made rambling speeches, like you did today, without any foundation—in fact, that was the situation in most cases!

An Hon. Senator: You have come alive!

Senator Argue: I used to make those rambling speeches on the loan sharks of this country that were charging exorbitant interest rates. Now I see that Parliament has at long last—

Senator Flynn: Interest rates!

Senator Argue: —moved against VISA and Master Charge and some of the others. They are 25 years late, but better late than never.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I—

Senator Nurgitz: Let us hear from a lawyer!

An Hon. Senator: One lawyer too many!

Senator Frith: Just saying a word from the perspective of the “too many,” there are two aspects to this bill that should concern us. The first is the process, and the second is the substance of the bill.

As for the process, I think we all agree that due process was not given to the passage of this bill in the other place. It is, I think, a classic case for the Senate to play the important role of a second chamber, and is compelling evidence for the need for two chambers.

I understand that even in the other place there is at this time some remorse over the process there, but it is not in order to comment on that, and I will not say anything more about it.

First thing, it is clear that it came as a surprise to the people of Canada, to the industry generally, and to political institutions to learn that this bill went through the three readings in a matter of minutes. There is clearly something that we must do about that.

On the substance, I am sure there is something to be said for the bill—and Senator Phillips has manfully tried to do so—but we also know, if we have been answering our telephones, that there seems to be a great deal to be said against the bill, such as why, if the patent was for 17 years, did the matter just suddenly come to us two weeks before the patent is due to expire. I understand that it expires on July 8. That is an important question that I believe the proponents of the bill—I think it is Searle—will have to answer.

There is also the fact that although the passage of the bill is said to promise some increase in jobs and investments, again, if we have been answering our phones and reading our mail, we realize that there is the other side to that coin also. That is, the possibility that many times the investments to take place, if the bill is passed, could take place, if it is not, because of the increased competitive environment. It is not unusual, in large industries where important patents are involved, for companies to watch for the expiry of a patent and to invest, then, in the new more competitive field resulting from the patent's not being extended. That, in turn, brings us to the question of substance as to whether it is a good idea ever to extend patents in that context. Because persons who start planning investments to engage in competitive activity when a patent is gone will feel a bit insecure if they think there is no way of relying on patents for a set period. We know that the philosophy, the whole concept of patents is to encourage inventiveness and creativity and to give a protected period so that the encouragement of a monopoly, in effect, will operate to stimulate creativity, investment and invention.

Senator Flynn: Senator Argue agrees with you on that point.

Senator Frith: It is clear that we have a role to play here which springs from a mistake in process in the other place, plus some substantial questions. It should go to a committee for recommendation about where we should go from here. It is, as someone has said, a classic case for sober second thought.

The only procedural difficulty that I can see—and it is a small one, I admit—is that second reading is usually given to a bill before it goes to a committee. Second reading debate is on the principle of a bill. I cannot say for myself that I am even ready to support the principle of this bill, let alone its details. I make that footnote comment so that when I holler, “On division”—as some others may—it is to say that we do not necessarily approve the principle of this bill, but that for procedural reasons it is the best way to get it to the committee for report.

I support what Senator Phillips says. I think we should give it second reading now, on division. The explanation for the “on division” is that we do not necessarily agree with the principle of the bill. We can then send it to the committee. As we know, the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, under our rules, has as part of its mandate the consideration of patents.

An Hon. Senator: Very good.

Hon. Jean Le Moyne: Honourable senators, would the sponsor of the bill receive one question?

We were speaking of substance. Maybe we should not forget the substance of that chemical.

I have in hand here an article that appeared in the July issue of the Scientific American, which I received yesterday. It shows strong reservations about Aspartame. It is an opinion, but if we are doing some sober second thought, our sober second thought should apply to the substance.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, the point raised by Senator Frith at the end of his remarks relates to the point which was made by Senator Stewart at our last meeting as to whether, on a private bill, we are voting on the principle.

[Senator Argue.]

● (1630)

Senator Frith: Good point.

Senator Flynn: The view has been clearly expressed by Beauchesne that on a private bill we are not deciding on the principle, and that the objective of second reading is merely to refer the matter to a committee to establish the facts. So, the principle of a private bill of that nature involves the facts.

Senator Frith: That is a good point.

Senator Flynn: It is difficult to discuss the facts. Senator Argue can easily do that before he knows them—

Senator Argue: I am psychic.

Senator Flynn: —but I cannot before I know what is involved. So there should be no problem with second reading and referring the bill to committee.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Flynn has raised a good point, and it reminds me of something else. When we refer this bill, we may want to suspend—

Senator Flynn: Oh, yes, the other rule.

Senator Frith: Yes.

Senator Flynn: We can do that after second reading.

Senator Frith: Is it rule 95? The motion for reference to the committee should include the suspension of the provisions of rule 95. I am looking at rule 95 which refers to bills originating in the Senate, so it does not apply. However, we want to be sure that we are not restrained as to time and that it does not require a week's delay.

Senator Stewart: Honourable senators, it has been suggested by Senator Flynn that this is a private bill. However, it did not come to us as a private bill. It came to us as a private member's public bill; it is described in that way in the records of the House of Commons. In fact, contrary to the suggestion made earlier that all three parties somehow or other bungled so that the bill was passed there, it is quite clear from the record of the other place, at pages 7345 and 7346, that the government leadership there assisted quite deliberately and knowingly in the passage of the bill in that place. This, then, is a public bill. It entails, as Erskine May says, "state policy." That is why I asked earlier if what is proposed to be done by this bill is consistent with state policy with regard to the extension of patents during the past few years. Or is state policy now being changed by a private member's bill, facilitated by the government in the House of Commons and perhaps here? After all, the person who is sponsoring the bill today is the government whip, and the senator in whose name the motion for second reading stood is the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, Senator Frith referred earlier to rule 95. I believe he was looking for rule 94.

Senator Frith: Yes, it is 94.

Senator Corbin: In the circumstances, I believe that rule 94 is pertinent. However, it does not give the house much leeway. It reads:

After its first reading and before its consideration by any other committee, a private bill from the House of Commons, for which no petition has been received by the Senate, shall be taken into consideration and reported on by the Committee on Standing Rules and Orders in like manner as a petition.

Is that not what the honourable senator was referring to?

Senator Frith: Yes, but that rule raises the same question that Senator Stewart has raised as to whether when the words "private bill" are used in the rules they mean private members' public bills or private members' private bills.

Senator Flynn: It is hard to classify.

Senator Frith: Yes, it is hard to classify. In any event, let us be sure that when we send the bill to committee the committee is not impeded in its considerations, and if the suspension of a rule is necessary—and Senator Corbin has cited rule 94—we should suspend it.

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I am reminded of another private member's bill which came from the other place, and that is the one that changed "Dominion Day" to "Canada Day". I wonder if it would have any bearing on what we are discussing here. You will recall that the bill was passed in the House of Commons by 13 members from all parties. Perhaps we could look at that bill as a precedent.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, this is a rather unusual day for me. I have heard the Honourable Senator Argue criticize the Liberals in this chamber, and I have heard him criticize the Liberals in the other place, but today is the first time I have heard him criticize the NDP.

Senator Argue: Come on! That is not true!

Senator Phillips: Honourable Senator Frith says that there are two sides to the coin.

Senator Guay: And you don't know the other side.

Senator Phillips: I agree with him, which is again an unusual occurrence for me. However, there are two sides to the coin. I am sponsoring this bill on behalf of the mover in the other place, and I have no doubt that there are problems associated with it. That is the reason I would like to see the bill move into committee, to let senators have a look at it from a viewpoint that I cannot present, because I have neither the knowledge nor the background to do it.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time, on division.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and that any rules preventing the committee from immediately considering and reporting the bill be suspended.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO MEET DURING SITTING OF THE SENATE

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, as chairman of the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee, I would like to say that tomorrow the committee has a meeting scheduled for 10 a.m. At that meeting we will consider reports on two other bills which we were pre-studying. If we have time before the Senate sits at 11 o'clock, we will turn our minds to Bill C-259. I wonder whether further consideration of these matters by the committee might be made available through a motion that may be made by one of my colleagues in this chamber.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I ask for leave to revert to Motions. Perhaps I should explain before leave is granted. I wish to ask for permission for the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee to meet tomorrow while the Senate is sitting.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, that request should meet our circumstances. For those who are interested, let us fix the time at 11.30 a.m. The committee is meeting in room 263-S.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(a), I move:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce have power to sit at eleven thirty o'clock in the forenoon tomorrow, Friday, 26th June, 1987, even though the Senate may then be sitting, and that rule 76(4) be suspended in relation thereto.

● (1640)

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, may I ask for clarification? When Senator Sinclair talked about the meeting of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and gave the time, he made reference to "those who might be interested." He was, I believe, referring to members of the Senate.

Senator Sinclair: Would the honourable senator please repeat his question?

Senator MacDonald: Yes, I will. Senator Sinclair, you indicated that when the committee meets to consider this matter, you said: "All those who may be interested . . .," and you gave the time of the meeting. I presume you meant all those members of this chamber who may be interested, and you were not referring to anyone else who was interested.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I meant senators who may be interested. However, if there are other people who feel that in the time available they can assist the committee, we would be glad to hear from them. However, I think we will need to rely on the knowledge and experience of senators in dealing with this matter.

However, if there are others who can establish any expertise in this matter, I would not preclude them from assisting us, keeping in mind the very short period of time that we have to deal with this matter.

Senator MacDonald: Senator Sinclair, are you calling witnesses?

Senator Sinclair: It all depends on who turns up, honourable senators. If someone turned up who was so knowledgeable that he was bound to be heard and would be of assistance to the committee, I would certainly inquire of the committee whether or not they wished to hear him. However, I would be in the hands of the committee in that regard.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, in response to this question of witnesses appearing before the committee, I caution the chairman that he should not leave the matter so open-ended. I have a feeling that Senator MacDonald feels the same way. There are literally dozens of people who want to be heard on this important bill, and at this point I am not suggesting that we do not hear witnesses. But it seems to me there has to be some reasonable program. For instance, if someone happened to be there tomorrow morning and was heard from by the committee, and if someone who is even more important were not heard, the criticism would be quite substantial.

I am suggesting to you that the committee first sit and work out its program and determine whether or not there will be time to, in fact, hear witnesses before the Senate adjourns for the summer.

Another decision that the committee will have to make is whether or not there is any other direction that we can take in order to deal with this matter expeditiously so that people can be given a chance to be heard.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I hope that honourable senators will leave it to the committee to be balanced, to be straightforward and to be reasonable. The fact that someone turns up does not mean, ipso facto, he will be heard by the committee.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to suggest very humbly to the chairman of the committee that in the consideration of inviting witnesses to appear before him and his committee he seriously look at the advisability of having legislative counsel present to determine whether or not the process by which this bill entered Parliament is proper or flawed. I have reason to believe that the process of introduction of this bill into the other place may very well have been flawed.

I see Senator Flynn shaking his head. Of course, I am not an expert; I readily acknowledge that, but I am led to understand by some of the people who, from time to time, advise us around the Senate that that matter, in itself, ought to be seriously considered. It may well be that this bill is improperly before Parliament.

Motion agreed to.

MOTOR VEHICLE TRANSPORT BILL, 1987

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-19, respecting motor vehicle transport by extra-provincial undertakings.

Bill read first time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

On motion of Senator Phillips, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), bill placed on the Orders of the Day for second reading at the next sitting of the Senate.

CRIMINAL CODE CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz moved the second reading of Bill C-15, to amend the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act.

He said: Honourable senators, I hope not to take too much of your time. Honourable senators will be familiar with the fact that in 1984 a committee was appointed by Parliament called the Committee on Sexual Offences Against Children and Youth, commonly referred to as the Badgley committee. That committee reported an alarming rate of sexual offences against children. The committee specifically reported that clearly one half of all Canadian females and one third of males are at some time victims of unwanted sexual acts, 80 per cent of which occur when the victims are children or youths.

In April of 1985 another committee, which had been established by the previous government, reported, and here I am referring to the Fraser committee which was a Special Committee on Pornography and Prostitution. The work of the Fraser committee, in part, overlapped that of the Badgley committee. In any event, that resulted in recommendations being made both with respect to certain aspects of child sexual abuse and of the child prostitution problem.

Both the Badgley and Fraser committees have made a significant contribution in identifying the scope of sexual abuse problems in Canada, especially where children are victims, and particularly with respect to those areas where the present legal system has failed us and, more importantly, has failed the victims.

Officials in the Department of Justice and other concerned departments have met with more than 300 individuals representing more than 200 different organizations across Canada to gather the views of certain non-governmental organizations and private-sector agencies concerned with children's issues about the recommendations of these committees. In addition, consultations have also been conducted with the provinces.

It is as a result of the extensive work of the Badgley and Fraser committees, along with the consultations undertaken by the Department of Justice, that Bill C-15 was developed.

At the outset, I might mention that the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, under the chairmanship of Senator Neiman, undertook a pre-study of Bill C-15. I cannot recall the number of committee meetings that were held, but certainly over the last six or seven months, starting in late November, the committee heard a wide range of witnesses dealing not only with the subject matter of the bill, I suggest, but with all kinds of related problems. We spent some considerable time dealing with the treatment of offenders. We spent some considerable time looking at the question of the possibility of rehabilitating people. In fact, we had meetings with abused children, which was perhaps a first, and certainly so in either of the two houses of Parliament. I suggest, honourable senators, that we have had a very thorough and complete examination of Bill C-15 and of the problems it deals with.

● (1650)

Honourable senators, I was out of the chamber this afternoon, but I understand that Senator Neiman has not yet reported.

Senator Neiman: That is correct.

Senator Nurgitz: Although I may be somewhat scooping her, my guess is that tomorrow you will find that the Senate committee will be recommending approval of this bill. I know that members of the committee had certain concerns, but they have been able to express those concerns by asking questions of those who will, in the next four years, be reviewing this legislation.

Many members of the committee were concerned about the fact that the bill does ask for heavier sentences for certain offences, which raises the question: Is that really the answer? I am sure all honourable senators would agree that that is not really a form of treatment, but I am afraid that the Canadian public is demanding that we deal in some firm fashion with this kind of offence.

Honourable senators, the overall principles contained in Bill C-15 are basically to protect children from sexual abuse and exploitation. It is not that the law did not previously provide some form of protection, but I am sure that those of you who have been following this issue over the years know that the law did not protect them adequately. It was very difficult for those in either the legal business or the police business to tell either a parent of an abused child or a child who had been abused that their evidence is not good enough. They would have to be told that they would have to provide some independent proof.

Honourable senators will be aware that this kind of offence is normally perpetrated by a person who makes certain that there is no one else around who can provide some independent form of evidence. That was the difficulty encountered in trying to prosecute those kinds of offences. In many ways this bill does overcome that kind of problem by removing from the Evidence Act the need for corroboration in these kinds of offences.

The other overall principle is an attempt to deter those who would seek to victimize children and to assist in breaking the cycle of abuse by using our system of justice to protect those who cannot protect themselves. The committee heard a good deal of evidence to the effect that many abusers were, in their own childhood, abused themselves.

The aim is to provide legislation which is as effective as possible in protecting the rights of young victims while, at the same time, ensuring that the rights of the accused are also equally protected. There is no question that with this kind of legislation we are lessening those kinds of rights that we often afford accused persons, because it is deemed, as a matter of policy I suggest, that we have to do this in order to protect young people today.

The main elements of the bill seem to rationalize the current law relating to abuse or sexual acts involving children and young persons. Bill C-15 will create three new criminal offences which will ensure that children under 14 years of age are protected almost absolutely from all manner of sexual contact while children up to the age of 18 years would be protected from sexual exploitation by anyone in a position of trust or authority or on whom the child is dependent.

These three new criminal offences would be: first, sexual interference; second, invitation to sexual touching; and third, sexual exploitation.

The bill also creates a new indictable offence to address the exploitation of our children by those who seek their services as prostitutes and by those who would benefit financially by putting them to work as prostitutes. This new indictable offence would be punishable by a maximum sentence of five years for anyone who, in any place, tries to obtain the services of a juvenile prostitute.

It is not sufficient, I suggest, to create new sexual offences alone. The evidence we heard indicated the need for providing for a number of amendments to the Canada Evidence Act as well in order to resolve the problem of the admissibility of evidence given by children and to put in place more flexible mechanisms to gather that evidence. An amendment to the Criminal Code will remove the current need for corroboration of the unsworn evidence of a child.

The bill will also provide or will allow for the improvement of court arrangements in order to make it easier to receive the testimony of children, such as the possible use of screens or other devices to shield the complainant from the view of the accused. I need not tell honourable senators of the difficulty in a situation where there is a father, stepfather or a person in authority over a child who abused the child, and the child has to sit in an open courtroom where the one person they see, smack in front of them, is that person of authority who has, over months or years, abused them. That is a difficult situation in which that child has to give evidence.

The new legislation attempts to remove eye contact. This can be done by a simple form of screen, it can be done by using a separate room with closed circuit, and there are many other simple ways of providing for this, and at the same time providing for the rights of the accused to be present at his trial. This will allow a child to give evidence freely, without any form of intimidation or duress.

The use of videotapes is also a new form of evidence gathering, provided that the videotape is taken within a reasonable time after the alleged offence. We heard a good deal of evidence of that, and some concerns were expressed by members of the committee. I believe that the committee will ask that in time, when the legislation is reviewed, those particular sections be looked at very carefully. The committee also heard evidence from U.S. authorities that, in fact, videotaping was not a commonly used evidence tool, and that it was used more as an aid in the work leading up to trial. If the evidence were recorded on videotape, they would not have to put the child through five, ten or fifteen instances of describing the offence. If the evidence were on videotape, they would re-run the tape to check the evidence, without involving the child again.

Lastly, there was an improvement made, and I might mention that this was done in the legislative committee, as to when a child can give evidence. Those senators who may have practised law some years ago will be familiar with some of the old rules applied by judges in taking the evidence of children. Those rules were rather strict. This legislation, when first introduced, maintained that the court would hear evidence if the child were sufficiently intelligent to give it. The committee found that such a test is not put to an adult, so the bill, as amended, provides that a child can give evidence as long as he is able to communicate that evidence.

The studies conducted by both the legislative committee in the other place and the committee of the Senate were extensive. The overwhelming majority of witnesses who appeared expressed general support of the bill. As a result of the evidence heard by the legislative committee—and the Senate committee monitored those amendments as they were being made—the bill does reflect all of the amendments that were approved in the committee of the House of Commons. Those amendments, while certainly not affecting the main thrust of the bill, served to further enhance the protection of children and their access to our criminal justice system.

In conclusion, while the individual legislative proposals were the subject of some critical comment, I think it is fair to say that, over all, the bill was welcomed by those who have to deal regularly with child victims of sexual abuse. Secondly, the bill's aim is to protect children and young people from abuse by creating new offences and enhancing children's access to our criminal justice system and the court system. At the same time, respect for the rights of accused persons underlies these proposals. In making such substantial changes to so significant an area of the law, it is necessary to monitor the effectiveness of the bill very carefully. The bill does provide for this to begin immediately and provides for a full review to be commenced after four years' time. This, of course, does not preclude earlier modifications if any unintended consequences of an adverse nature come to light.

Honourable senators, this bill would certainly rank as one that has received more careful consideration than any other that I have been involved with in my eight years in the Senate. I should point out as well that Mr. Robert Kaplan, the member for York Centre in the other place, speaking on behalf of the Liberal opposition, said that while the recommendations do not go as far as those of the Badgley commission, they are a tremendous improvement over the present law. He urged passage of the bill. Both Mr. Svend Robinson and Mr. Nelson Riis of the New Democratic Party applauded the bill. They said they had some minor reservations, but that none was sufficient to ask that the bill be held up. It received speedy passage at that point. I note that Senator Argue is shaking his head—perhaps he is worried about that.

Senator Argue: It's the NDP, that's all, but it's a minor point.

Senator Nurgitz: Senator Argue, I always worry about the NDP. In any event, I ask that this bill receive the favourable consideration of honourable senators.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Nurgitz. I agree that the committee has done a very thorough job on this legislation. It is important from many points of view. The one aspect that is of concern to me is the change to the need for corroboration. As I understand it, the committee is saying that the requirement in section 246 of the Criminal Code for absolute corroboration is to be modified.

Senator Nurgitz: That is correct.

Senator Frith: That is not to say that a judge is prevented from commenting to the jury on the absence of corroboration and alerting a jury, if he thinks it appropriate, to the advantage of having corroborated evidence over uncorroborated evidence, is that correct?

Am I also correct that at the present time there is still need for corroboration of the evidence of the complainant on what was known as a rape charge, or what is now called sexual assault?

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I will answer the second question first. Sexual assault is a whole other area, and, of course, we are not dealing with children's evidence now. There is still the need for corroboration of the evidence of an adult. At the moment we are dealing with the question of the uncorroborated evidence of a child. We ought not to forget that we are dealing with something that is less, in some ways, than a sexual assault, or what used to be called rape. We could even be talking about sexual exploitation. Many of these acts are not as complete as what was formerly called rape. You could not convict on the uncorroborated evidence of a child.

Senator Frith: That is according to section 246 of the Criminal Code.

Senator Nurgitz: Yes. The committee was concerned about a judge now being precluded from commenting on the uncorroborated evidence. He is precluded from making such comments, which then raises the question: What happens if, in the judge's view, that evidence was thin or a touch unreliable? A judge cannot comment on the lack of corroboration. I suppose that that does not preclude a judge from commenting on the shaky nature of the evidence.

We are now saying that a child's evidence is like an adult's evidence—it should stand on its own. We are saying that we should not place an extra onus upon a child just because he or she is a child.

On motion of Senator Neiman, debate adjourned.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-56 TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to table its fifteenth report respecting the subject matter of Bill C-56, to amend certain acts relating to financial institutions. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate of this day and that it form part of the permanent records of this house.

JUDGES ACT FEDERAL COURT ACT TAX COURT OF CANADA ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jacques Flynn moved the second reading of Bill C-41, to amend the Judges Act, the Federal Court Act and the Tax Court of Canada Act.

He said:

[Translation]

Honourable senators, although Bill C-41 deals with rather important questions, it is in fact an update, a housekeeping measure as we usually say. These are problems which piled up with the passage of time with respect to certain circumstances and to which we are now seeking a solution.

The bill deals with four issues.

The first relates to the indexation of salaries and pensions under the Judges Act. It is a matter of replacing the industrial composite, which is no longer used, by the industrial aggregate. Statistics Canada has changed the formula. The current definition no longer applies, so it has to be replaced by the one now used by Statistics Canada. Therefore this is not a major problem.

The second is more important, the retirement age. Pursuant to the constitutional statute, judges appointed by the federal government to provincial superior courts must retire at age 75. This legislative provision does not apply to county courts, the Federal Court and the Tax Court of Canada. In these three cases—

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): What was the first one?

Senator Flynn: The Federal Court, the Tax Court of Canada and the county courts. I think there are only three provinces where county courts still exist and continue to operate.

The acts on these three courts provide for retirement at the age of 70 instead of at 75 as in the case of Superior Court judges. I point out in passing that the Supreme Court Act provides for retirement at the age of 75. However, this is in the Supreme Court Act, not in the 1867 Constitution Act.

We are therefore being asked to raise the retirement age of County Court, Tax Court and Federal Court judges to 75.

I was personally very surprised to learn that Federal Court judges had to retire at the age of 70 rather than at 75. I was informed that a Federal Court judge questioned the constitutionality of this provision by saying that he was the victim of discrimination compared with Superior Court judges and that he won his case. It is therefore necessary for the government—

Senator Frith: The time has come!

Senator Flynn: —to make the necessary legislative amendments. The bill includes provisions which apply to judges who have already retired at the age of 70 instead of at 75. These provisions will allow them to hold office as supernumerary judges until the age of 75. There are a series of ad hoc provisions for special cases. From now on, all judges appointed by the Governor in Council will retire at the age of 75. This is the second point.

I have just referred to the third point in passing. It concerns the position of supernumerary judges. Under the Judges Act, which applies to the Superior Courts, a judge who has held judicial office for at least 15 years and who has reached the age of 65 can retire at that time and elect to become a supernumerary judge, which creates a vacancy in his former position. He can however continue to hold judicial office on a part-time basis. He is then on reserve. Having such supernumerary judges has often helped to eliminate backlogs in the judicial system.

There are identical arrangements for the judges who wish to continue to sit on the Federal Court, the Tax Court and the County Courts.

These provisions apply therefore to these judges and, by the way, in the cases I have just mentioned, to the judges who would have been forced to retire at age 70 instead of age 75.

The last clause deals with the removal of judges. The Constitution Act provides that a Superior Court judge is removable by the Governor General on address of the Senate and the House of Commons. These provisions did not apply to County Court judges and those of the other courts I have just mentioned. In the legislation dealing with these courts, it is mentioned that a judge can be removed following the recommendation of the Minister of Justice to the Governor General. Therefore, they want to apply the same procedure, that is to say, to use the joint address of the Senate and House of Commons in the case of the judges appointed by the federal government.

As I said, this is an updating of the legislation. The idea is to balance and provide the same treatment for all judges appointed by the Governor in Council. That is the purpose of the bill.

The bill met no objection from the House of Commons. It was read the first time on February 20, and the second time on March 27. At that time, it was referred to the committee which spent a whole session dealing with its subject matter. It returned to the House of Commons and remained on the order paper until June 23, when it was read the third time in a few minutes.

I do not really see the need to refer this bill to the Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs. If we want to, we could give it a few minutes consideration.

Senator Frith: I doubt I have anything to add to what Senator Flynn has said. As a former Minister of Justice, if he is really satisfied that various provisions of this bill support the principles he has explained, I am sure everybody is prepared to support this bill. However, for a period of 24 hours, I move the adjournment of this debate.

On the motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

ROYAL ASSENT

The Honourable Antonio Lamer, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, having come and being seated at the foot of the Throne, and the House of Commons having been summoned and being come with their Deputy Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the following bills:

An Act respecting the treatment of pension payments in determining certain unemployment insurance benefit entitlements and to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, 1971 (Bill C-50, Chapter 17, 1987)

An Act to provide for payments in respect of exploration for or development of lands for the production of hydrocarbons in Canada other than coal (Bill C-59, Chapter 18, 1987)

An Act respecting the reorganization of Bell Canada
(Bill C-13, Chapter 19, 1987)

The Honourable Marcel Danis, Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, then addressed the Honourable the Deputy Governor General as follows:

May it please Your Honour:

The Commons of Canada have voted certain supplies required to enable the Government to defray the expenses of the public service.

In the name of the Commons, I present to Your Honour the following bill:

An Act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Government of Canada for the financial year ending the 31st March, 1988 (Bill C-65, Chapter 20, 1987)

To which bill I humbly request Your Honour's assent.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to give the Royal Assent to the said bill.

The House of Commons withdrew.

The Honourable the Deputy Governor General was pleased to retire.

• (1730)

The sitting of the Senate was resumed.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS— CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake constitutional accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I understand that we are still trying to arrange for the attendance of two witnesses. It may be that we will end up with only one before June 30. There is also outstanding the question of whether we will try to at least offer, but not necessarily have, television access on an experimental basis, for whatever witness we have, to see how it works.

Those two things will not be settled, obviously, this afternoon, but I mention this to say that we should deal with them tomorrow.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I wonder if it would be possible to set a time for witnesses. In fairness to witnesses, we should be able to tell them approximately when we expect them so that they will not be waiting for three or four hours. If we could agree to Monday, we could have a witness available on Monday.

Senator Frith: We might talk about sitting Monday morning also to give us more time.

Senator Molgat: Perhaps the order could be placed at the beginning of the Orders of the Day. Were that feasible, we could tell the witness that we expect him to be available at such-and-such a time.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, we are a long way from reaching those decisions, in my opinion. It might be a better idea to postpone this item until tomorrow when others who can speak for the government are here to discuss the question of who the witnesses will be and when we should hear them. I, for one, would think that it would be a little presumptuous for us to proceed on those matters at the moment. We should hold it over until tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: Do everything at the same time.

Senator Molgat: I have discussed it with the government leader in the Senate. He had no objection to proceeding that way, but I am quite agreeable to wait until tomorrow. If we agree to Monday, I can reach the witness tomorrow afternoon.

Order stands.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 11.00 a.m.

FORGIVENESS OF CERTAIN OFFICIAL DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE DEBTS

REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON FOREIGN AFFAIRS
ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-62

Thursday, June 25, 1987

The Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs has the honour to present its

NINTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of the Bill C-62, an Act relating to the forgiveness of debts incurred or assumed in respect of certain official development assistance loans made by the Government of Canada to the Governments of Togo and of the Islamic Republic of Mauritania and also to the former East African Community, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto, has in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, June 16, 1987, examined the subject matter of the said Bill and now reports as follows:

The purpose of this Bill is to enable the Government to forgive the past debts incurred on Canadian official development assistance (ODA) loans by two very low-income African countries and by the former, now defunct, East African Community (composed at the time of Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda).

The amounts to be forgiven, totalling $68.4 million, comprise:

Togo	$16.6 million
Mauritania	$4.2 million
Kenya	$19.8 million
Tanzania	$15.5 million
Uganda	$12.3 million

In 1977, at the time of the Conference on International Economic Cooperation, Canada forgave the ODA debts of 12 least developed countries (LLDCs). Recently, Togo and Mauritania qualified by definition as LLDCs and, as a result, Canada is, by this Bill, granting them the same debt relief. Following the dissolution of the East African Community (EAC), the combined ODA debts to Canada by the three member states were divided between Kenya, Tanzania and Uganda in the amounts shown above. As Tanzania and Uganda qualified as LLDCs, the Canadian Government wished to forgive their EAC debts. While Kenya is not a LLDC, the Government considered it equitable to cancel its share of the EAC debts at the same time.

In 1986 the Government offered a moratorium on repayments of Canadian ODA debt, initially for five years but extendable in five-year periods to the year 2000, to all sub-Saharan African countries demonstrating a commitment to undertake necessary economic adjustment. ODA debt of this nature owed by such countries to Canada totalled almost $700 million, loaned to these countries on extremely concessional terms. While practically speaking this action constitutes a write-off of these debts, the obligations continue to be carried as assets in the public accounts of Canada.

In its recent report on Third World debt problems, this Committee commended Canada's 1977 debt forgiveness for LLDCs as well as the Government's 1986 announcement that all future ODA would be grants rather than partial grants and partial loans as previously. When combined with the Government's 1986 moratorium offer and the debt forgiveness of Bill C-62, Canada will have effectively written off all of its ODA debt in sub-Saharan Africa. The Committee is impressed that Canada, having implemented unilateral measures of debt relief, is now taking the lead in pressing other creditor countries, at the Venice Summit and elsewhere, to consider other ways of assisting the heavily burdened low-income African debtor countries.

It should be kept in mind, however, that relief of Canada's ODA debt for sub-Saharan African countries does not include its official commercial debt such as that associated with the credits granted by the Export Development Corporation and the Wheat Board given on commercial terms.

The Committee was concerned by the short title of the Bill which does not adequately describe the subject matter. In the Committee's opinion, it would be all but impossible for any person wishing to locate this Bill, five years hence, in a statute citator to identify it under the present short title. The Committee does not, however, wish to recommend delaying the Bill on this account as a delay could send an unfortunate signal to sub-Saharan African countries.

The Committee also discussed section 5 of the Bill. The Committee was advised that, beginning in 1986, the Government decided to treat ODA loans henceforth as budgetary items and to include the expenditure in the budget. Previously, loans had been treated as non-budgetary items and had been regarded as assets that would ultimately be repaid.

This decision to classify ODA loans henceforth as budgetary items did not apply to the earlier ODA loans that had not been repaid, including the loans covered by the moratorium referred to above. In order to remove from the public accounts a debt that is to be forgiven as in this Bill, it is necessary for the Government to write it off as a budgetary expenditure. The Committee is, accordingly, satisfied that the language in section 5 is accurate. Since the Committee anticipates that a number of the loans covered by the 1986 moratorium are unlikely to be repaid, the Committee would be interested in having the Auditor General's comments as to whether all of the outstanding ODA loans in sub-Saharan Africa should be converted to a budgetary expenditure.

Your Committee has reviewed the subject matter of Bill C-62 in accordance with the Order of Reference and recommends the said Bill, when examined by the Senate, be favourably considered.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

FOURTH REPORT OF STANDING JOINT COMMITTEE

THURSDAY, June 25, 1987

The Standing Joint Committee on Official Languages has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT

Introduction

1. In compliance with its Orders of Reference from the Senate dated Tuesday, 16 December 1986, and Tuesday, 31 March 1987, and its Orders of Reference from the House of Commons dated Wednesday, 26 November 1986, and Tuesday, 31 March 1987, your Committee has considered the 1985 and 1986 reports of the Commissioner of Official Languages.

2. Since 10 December 1986, your Committee has held 19 public hearings at which it heard representatives of 16 government departments and other federal agencies (see appended list of these sittings and witnesses). The purpose of the hearings was to investigate in detail the degree to which the provisions of the Official Languages Act were being implemented within those departments and bodies. These meetings enabled us to assess the effectiveness of the mechanisms for implementing the official languages program within the federal public service, and of the coordination work being done by the central bodies responsible for the program.

3. Since it was created in May 1980, your Committee has tabled a number of comprehensive reports to Parliament dealing with improvements to the Official Languages Act and the measures being taken to implement the official languages program within the official-language minorities and the federal public service. Although considerable progress has been made since the Act came into force, the Committee has found that much remains to be done. It has therefore proposed administrative and legislative solutions to encourage language reform in Canada.

4. In its first report, tabled 8 July 1981, the Committee raised the question of language of service, and made recommendations on bilingual districts.

imperative staffing, the concept of "active offer of service" and identification of bilingual positions. In June 1982, it submitted a comprehensive report on the thorny problem of language of work. In April 1983, in its fifth report to Parliament, the Committee described the results of its lengthy consideration of three main aspects where reform was required: language of service, language of work, and equitable participation. In June 1986, it reiterated the demands contained in its fifth report and proposed possible new approaches. Recently, the Committee tabled a report on a crucial issue for official-language minorities: education in their own language. The same report also expressed the wish that the bill to amend the Official Languages Act be referred to the Committee, given its unflagging interest in language reform since 1980.

5. The government has responded to the Committee's reports on two occasions. In December 1983, Prime Minister Trudeau said that his government acknowledged the need for improvements in the Official Languages Act and was continuing to look into the matter, especially in light of the provisions in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. With respect to the administrative measures proposed by the Committee for the three sectors of language reform, the government recognized the need to spell out both the concepts and the mechanisms for implementing them. In October 1985, this time over the signature of Deputy Prime Minister Erik Nielsen, the government's response to the Committee was that it was committed to ensuring that the equal status of the two official languages would be respected, both in law and in fact. It recognized the need to revitalize the official languages program and to amend the Official Languages Act. It recalled that Treasury Board was responsible for detailed language planning within the federal public service, and promised that the President of the Treasury Board would ensure that language plans prepared by departments and other federal agencies were adequate and that mechanisms for monitoring implementation were effective.

The Official Languages Program within the Federal Public Service

6. This is the subject on which your Committee wishes to focus once again in this report, because the testimony it has heard from the 16 departments and agencies whose representatives appeared before it between December 1986 and June 1987 strongly suggests that the official languages program within the federal public service is not being vigorously pursued by management and is not receiving the attention it merits inside some of those departments and agencies themselves.

Program Management

7. Testimony from the representatives of departments and agencies who appeared before our Committee, and a review of the data found in the annual reports and language audits of the Office of the Commissioner of Official Languages, has led us to conclude that the official languages program within the federal public service suffers from a serious lack of direction and of follow-up measures. Treasury Board, which according to the government ought to be ensuring that language action plans prepared by departments and other federal agencies are adequate and that mechanisms for monitoring implementation are effective, has in recent years allowed the situation to deteriorate to a point where newly-constituted bodies (such as the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and Marine Atlantic) have been able to function without having submitted, and received approval for, an official languages plan; others (such as the RCMP) have sought to whittle down their goals; and still others (such as VIA Rail, Canada Post, Regional Industrial Expansion, Fitness and Amateur Sport, Correctional Services, National Defence) have been able to wriggle out of their language obligations by pleading some habitual excuses such as a lack of Francophone professionals and scientists, collective agreements or the lack of tools to work in French.

8. Administration of the official languages program within the federal public service has gone through a number of stages since the Official Languages Act was passed in 1969. Initially centralized, it was subsequently partially handed over to the various departments and other federal agencies, which set up "Official Languages Branches" responsible for implementing the program. The third phase provided for integration of language functions into managers' other duties, along with the responsibility for drawing up annual official-language plans. In the future, according to new management principles, these plans will be replaced by formal management agreements, or letters of understanding, between Treasury Board and the respective Deputy Ministers. Unfortunately, whatever the management structure, the conditions for an effective system of accountability have not been put into place. It all too often happens that failure does not result in either criticism or penalty, so that, as a last resort, dissatisfied employees have to start denunciations like those that occurred recently in the RCMP and CSIS.

Language of Service

9. Despite the very clear provisions on language of service set down in sections 9 and 10 of the Official Languages Act and section 20 of the Charter, Canadians are not always served in the official language of their choice, even in the country's bilingual regions. This situation is unacceptable especially in government agencies with coercive powers (the RCMP, Canadian Security Intelligence Service, Correctional Services) or that operate in situations where the health and safety of the public may be at risk (Marine Atlantic, VIA Rail). Certain other bodies continue to project a unilingual image of Canada, though their offices or services are distributed across the country (Petro-Canada, Canada Post).

Language of Work

10. Parliament's 1973 resolution established clearly the right of federal civil servants to work in their first official language, as long as they respected the right of members of the public to be served in the official language of their choice. Unfortunately, this aspect of the official languages program continues to present a seemingly insurmountable obstacle to the principle of the equality of the two official languages in the federal public service. Even in federal agencies with a critical mass of employees from the minority group (20 to 25%), the dominant language of work is, to an overwhelming extent, English. It must be noted that Treasury Board has issued very few guidelines on promoting the use of French at work, whether in training, in meetings, in performance appraisals or in internal documents. The many complaints filed with the Office of the Commissioner of Official Languages by public servants who feel that their right to work in the language of their choice has been infringed suggests that Treasury Board should be issuing more such directives; otherwise, the very concept of "language of work" will remain a nebulous notion without any basis in reality.

Equitable Participation

11. Though the government has succeeded in establishing a participation rate for the two language groups that corresponds to their national demographic proportions, the underlying goal has not been achieved because disparities persist in certain employment categories and regions. The Committee has noted that Francophones are almost invariably underrepresented in the management, scientific and professional categories and overrepresented in administrative support. Furthermore, they are always underrepresented in certain regions, while Anglophones are always underrepresented in Quebec. It would therefore appear that members of the official language minorities cannot be said to have equal access to positions and promotions in the federal public service. This was an essential condition to the attainment of "full participation in the Public Service by members of both the anglophone and francophone communities" that Parliament had pledged in its 1973 Resolution. That is why the Committee recommends:

RECOMMENDATION 1

- That Treasury Board put forward specific guidelines to ensure equitable participation of both linguistic communities at all levels of the federal public administration.

Mechanisms for Implementation of the Official Languages Program within the Federal Public Service

12. In its discussions with the representatives of 16 federal departments and agencies, the Committee investigated the mechanisms for implementation of the official languages program in each of their various aspects of activity. These mechanisms are: identification of the language requirements of positions, staffing, bilingualism bonus, language training, translation and incentives to work in the language of choice. Without minimizing the importance of a firm engagement and of an adequate determination on the part of senior management within departments and agencies regarding linguistic reform, the Committee would like to make recommendations on some of these mechanisms, with a view to revitalizing the official languages program in the federal public service.

a) Identification of Language Requirements of Positions

13. If one fact stood out in the testimony given by Deputy Ministers and heads of federal agencies, it was the need to have more employees in senior management positions, in supervisory positions and amongst professionals offering certain specialized services to the public (ex. lawyers, doctors, social workers), with a thorough knowledge of their second language. Under the current system for designating bilingual positions, managers are required to have an intermediate grasp of their second language (level B), which is plainly inadequate. This must be rectified, and the Committee therefore recommends:

RECOMMENDATION 2

- That senior federal public service managers, supervisors and professionals offering specialized services to the public, in positions that have been designated bilingual, be required to have superior knowledge (level C) of their second language.

14. The elementary level (level A) of second-language knowledge was perhaps useful in the early days of the public service's official languages program, but it would now seem that the minimal abilities required for classification at this level are skewing the data on institutional bilingualism, since civil servants with only this grasp of their second language cannot really serve the public in both official languages. The Committee believes that it is time to raise the overall level of government bilingualism by phasing out this elementary level and requiring employees in bilingual positions who serve the public to have at least an intermediate knowledge of their second language. In 1986, 10% (6,464) of the positions designated bilingual were occupied by employees whose level of bilingualism was only A. The Committee therefore recommends:

RECOMMENDATION 3

- That the designation of positions as requiring elementary (level A) second-language knowledge be phased out for federal public service positions designated bilingual whose incumbents must offer a service to the public, to be replaced by a designation of positions as requiring intermediate (level B) second-language knowledge.

b) Staffing of Positions Designated Bilingual

15. In 1986, only 28.6% of public service positions were designated bilingual, while 58.8% were designated "English essential." The 1973 parliamentary resolution contained special provisions to ensure that unilingual employees applying for bilingual positions were not penalized, provided they agreed to take French courses at government expense. This conditional staffing system, which was supposed to be a temporary measure, ultimately became firmly entrenched, so much so that today, many unilingual employees continue to be appointed to bilingual positions. Although your Committee has repeatedly called for the discontinuation of this practice, which disregards the merit principle, it has in fact been extended on two occasions and maintained, while no timetable has been established for its elimination. On the contrary, certain recent Treasury Board directives have lowered the requirements for the imperative staffing of bilingual positions. During the most recent round of public hearings, it became clear to our Committee that the departments and agencies that have been the most successful in terms of implementing the official languages program are those which have applied the imperative staffing process wisely. It was also apparent that the conditional staffing system is undeservedly popular. In 1986, it resulted in the appointment of 1,196 unilingual incumbents to bilingual positions, of which 729 were not exempted on the grounds of age or language of service. Therefore, the Committee recommends:

RECOMMENDATION 4

- That all positions designated bilingual be staffed on an imperative basis, thus recognizing that bilingualism is an integral part of the merit principle within the federal public service.

c) Bilingualism Bonus

16. This bilingualism incentive, initially intended for employees in lower job levels, has now become a kind of universal payment made to all those with proven second-language capabilities, whatever the level. The bonus is today a part of the collective bargaining process and, as such, it would be extremely difficult to eliminate it. The bonus costs the federal treasury $45.5 million and, as everyone knows, it is often paid to persons whose bilingual status is questionable. Treasury Board, working in cooperation with the National Joint Committee, has agreed to introduce measures designed to test the second-language skills of all bonus recipients. The government has allowed a costly and uncontrollable situation to develop. It would do well to attempt to establish clearly-defined criteria and to refuse to pay the bonus to those who fail to satisfy the clearly defined bilingualism criteria. Without passing judgement on the merits of the bonus, the Committee recommends:

RECOMMENDATION 5

- That the bilingual bonus be given to all employees holding a position that has been designated as bilingual within the public service administration and requiring at least an intermediate level of bilingualism and that it establish an effective system of control to monitor the level of bilingualism of such beneficiaries on a regular basis.

d) Language Training

17. It seems that the government now draws a distinction between institutional needs and career needs when offering language training to its employees during business hours. However, it will continue to offer training to bonus recipients who the tests show have declined in their second language proficiency. There appear to be some inconsistencies in the new regulations governing access to language training. The Committee therefore recommends:

RECOMMENDATION 6

- That the criteria governing access to language training be clearly defined and applied in a uniform manner.

e) Incentives to Work in the Language of One's Choice

18. It is generally recognized that it is not easy to change attitudes and behaviour where language is concerned. Considering that both historically and practically, English has been the most commonly used language within the federal public service (except in Quebec), it is easy to see why exceptional incentives must be found to encourage bilingual Francophones and Anglophones to develop the habit of working in French. Treasury Board should therefore come up with some incentives and formulate directives to ensure that federal departments and agencies give their employees the opportunity to work in the language of their choice. Consequently, the Committee recommends:

RECOMMENDATION 7

- That Treasury Board develop a policy and programs to ensure equal status to French and English as languages of work within the federal public administration.

Management of the Official Languages Program

19. Treasury Board is responsible for the general administration of the official languages program throughout the federal public service. The members of our Committee feel that in recent years, Treasury Board has not shown strong leadership in the four program management sectors, namely planning, accountability, resources and monitoring.

20. Departmental official language plans were used for planning purposes between 1977 and 1985. In the past few years, the focus has shifted to letters of understanding between Deputy Ministers and Treasury Board Secretariat. While these letters of understanding were being drafted, little attention was paid to departmental plans. This lack of leadership created a void that rapidly led to a laissez-faire attitude.

21. The idea was to make departmental and agency administrators responsible for the language program. However, by integrating the program into the everyday activities of these administrators, it became diluted. Program responsibility was transferred to the branches, and managers never really assumed any leadership. Once again, however, we are faced with a void, since the Official Languages Branches have now been disbanded, without official recognition that their responsibilities have been transferred to senior management.

22. Senior managers within federal departments and agencies have been ordered to cut expenditures and reduce program staff levels. Their appraisals are tied to their ability to implement these cuts. Managers are reluctant to increase or maintain spending levels for their official languages program when they have to make cuts to other programs. This may explain the significant reduction in the number of positions directly tied to the management of the official languages program within departments and agencies. Seemingly, there are no longer enough human and financial resources to ensure that the program has the desired effect.

23. Finally, the fourth, but by no means least important, weakness in the management of the program is the lack of control exercised by Treasury Board. For decentralized management to be effective, it is important that programs and the results they generate be evaluated and that disciplinary action be taken in cases where performance is manifestly poor. According to the testimony heard over the past six months, it would seem that far too often it was left up to the departments to modify their plans, either by pushing back timetables or even, in some cases, by redrafting them.

24. The Committee is concerned that the official languages program may be running out of steam, particularly in the departments that gave testimony in recent months. It is concerned that Treasury Board may not be doing its job as far as the program is concerned.

The Committee therefore recommends:

RECOMMENDATION 8

- That, when tabling budgetary estimates, the President of Treasury Board table to Parliament an annual report on the status of the official languages program within the federal public service and on any new measure liable to modify it.

RECOMMENDATION 9

- That Treasury Board Secretariat display evident leadership in coordinating the four management components of the official languages program within the federal public service; that is, planning, accountability, resources and monitoring.

RECOMMENDATION 10

- That all federal departments and agencies be compelled to submit annually to Treasury Board Secretariat, for its approval, an Official Languages Plan, and that disciplinary measures (such as demotion, transfer or salary freeze) be taken against senior managers having not done so or having not achieved the objectives of such plans.

RECOMMENDATION 11

- That all federal departments and agencies set up an Official Languages Branch which would report directly to the Deputy Minister (or Commissioner, or President) and which would be responsible for the official languages program in-house.

Conclusion

25. The 16 federal departments and agencies that testified before the Committee over the last six months are slated to make additional appearances this fall to report on their progress in ensuring promotion of the equality of the two official languages. The Committee also plans on examining the linguistic performance of other departments and agencies during the year. In addition, it will study the draft legislation to amend the Official Languages Act, in the hopes that it will contain proposals for reviving the official languages program within both the federal public service and the official languages minorities.

Respectfully submitted,

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON BANKING TRADE AND COMMERCE
ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-56

THURSDAY, June 25, 1987

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

FIFTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of the Bill C-56, An Act to amend certain Acts relating to financial institutions, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, 12th May, 1987, examined the subject-matter of the said Bill and now reports as follows:

Introduction

Bill C-56, introduced by the Honourable Thomas Hockin, Minister of State (Finance), on 7th May, 1987, replaces Bills C-8 and C-9, which were tabled on 6th October, 1986. These Bills in turn were essentially the same as Bills C-123 and C-103 of the previous session of this Parliament. C-56 carries forward from these Bills provisions empowering the Minister of Finance to review transfers of ownership of financial institutions, strengthening the ability of regulators to alter the conduct of financial institutions, and raising the financial standards of federally-incorporated insurance companies. It also contains new provisions that would allow federally-regulated financial institutions to own securities dealers and would clarify the conditions under which a mutual life insurance company would be deemed to be Canadian.

For the most part, the Bill's provisions are sound and enjoy wide industry support. In the remainder of this report we confine our remarks to those areas of the Bill where our investigation revealed shortcomings which ought to be addressed through amendments to the Bill, through appropriate regulatory provisions, or through provisions in the third legislative tranche which will implement the remaining reforms announced in the White Paper on New Directions for the Financial Sector, issued 18th December last.

Entry into securities activities

The Bill will allow federally-regulated financial institutions to own securities dealers, subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance. Witnesses appearing before the Committee raised several concerns about the specific provisions in the Bill relating to this new power.

1. There are no provisions in the Bill concerning the criteria that the Minister would apply to arrive at a decision to grant or deny approval. During our first meeting under this reference with departmental officials, Committee members questioned the absence of such criteria from the Bill and noted the contrast with those parts of the Bill which deal with transfers in ownership of trust, loan and insurance companies, which do provide a set of criteria that the Minister would apply in determining whether or not to approve a proposed transaction.

In subsequent meetings, the Committee found considerable support for the position that, in those cases where the applicant wishing to enter the securities market is a foreign-controlled firm, one of the criteria for approval ought to be the degree of access that Canadian investors enjoy in the securities market of the applicant's home country. At present, reciprocity is a consideration in cases involving application by a foreign bank to establish a Schedule B bank in Canada. Support for a reciprocity principle in cases involving entry in the securities market was expressed by the Economic Council of Canada, the Canadian Bankers' Association, and the Investment Dealers' Association.

In his appearance before the Committee on 18th June, the Minister of State (Finance), the Honourable Thomas Hockin, testified that reciprocity would in fact be one of the key factors that will be considered in permitting entry into Canada's securities markets by non-resident applicants.

2. The wording of the proposed amendments to allow banks to own a securities dealer differs from the corresponding amendment for trust, loan and insurance companies. Banks will be allowed to acquire "a Canadian corporation, the activities of which are limited to dealing in securities" (clause 2), whereas trust, loan and insurance companies will be allowed to acquire "any corporation incorporated in Canada to deal in securities" (clauses 7, 13, 45, 52). The Canadian Bankers' Association expressed concern that the word "limited" in the Bank Act amendment may be interpreted by the courts in a way that will restrict the powers of securities subsidiaries of banks relative to the powers of securities subsidiaries of trust, loan or insurance companies.

The Minister has agreed to correct this divergence. During the clause-by-clause review of the Bill by the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, he proposed amendments which would render the wording of the relevant clauses the same for banks and non-bank financial institutions.

3. Paragraph 174(2)i of the Bank Act prohibits banks from participating in a partnership. Non-bank financial institutions, as well as other corporations, face no similar restriction. One implication of this different treatment is that the joint venture route of entering the securities market will apparently be available to non-bank institutions but not to banks. We can see no reason for maintaining this restriction on banks. If it is fine for a bank to own part of a securities dealer, why is it unacceptable to be in partnership with one?

Legal Counsel to the Department of Finance pointed out to the Committee that the prohibition against joint ventures is not absolute: provisions under subsection 193(13) of the Bank Act do allow participation in a limited partnership for up to two years, and this term may be extended with the approval of the Minister. However, this subsection is clearly intended to cover only temporary investments in areas in which banks are normally precluded from operating. At a minimum, therefore, it would be unorthodox to rely upon it to override a general prohibition in the Bank Act. If it were not so, there would be no need to amend the Bank Act in order to give banks access to the securities industry: subsection 193(13) could be used to the same effect. It is clear to the Committee that the basic policy objective reflected in existing legislative provisions is one that is opposed to banks' engaging in business activities other than the business of banking and activities ancillary to banking. Now that this policy has changed — at least as far as entry into securities markets is concerned — it would seem reasonable that the legislative provisions should be amended to conform with the new objective.

Ownership transfers

The Bill proposes to amend the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, the Trust Companies Act and the Loan Companies Act to provide that the following types of transactions require review and approval by the Minister of Finance:

1. acquisitions of shares of an insurance, trust or loan company by any person or associated group who holds more than 10% of such a company or who would hold more than 10% as a result of the acquisition; and
2. acquisitions of shares of any corporation which holds or is associated with anyone who holds shares of an insurance, trust or loan company if: a) the person acquiring the shares together with his associates holds more than 10% of the corporation's shares or would hold more than 10% as a result of the acquisition, and b) the combined holdings of the person, the corporation and their associates exceed 10% of the shares of the insurance, trust or loan company.

Under existing legislation, approval of the Minister of Finance is required to start an insurance, trust or loan company, but once a company is established, change in control can occur without ministerial sanction or review. The presumed intent of the proposed review requirements is to ensure that persons who are unable to meet the criteria for starting a financial institution are prevented from buying one. In this light, the review provisions in the Bill are excessively broad in reach.

First, they would require review of acquisitions of shares of a financial institution by the person who already controls that institution. Clearly, if the purpose of the review is to enable the Minister to block transfers of ownership of financial institutions to individuals who are deemed unsuitable for such ownership, the review of share acquisitions by a person already in control of the institution is futile. Indeed, when the review provisions were first proposed in the form of draft legislation, on 29th November, 1985, the background notes tabled with the draft bill expressly stated that "certain transactions, such as stock dividend plans or additional share acquisitions of shareholders who clearly have control, would be exempt from this requirement [for review]."

In its present form the Bill allows the Governor in Council, by regulation, to exempt any share transaction from the Bill's review provisions. There is no indication in the Bill, however, of the types of transaction which might qualify for exemption. In the view of the Committee, the regulations drafted under this section ought to stipulate that acquisitions of shares in a financial institution by a person who already controls that institution would not be subject to review.

Second, the Bill would require review of share transfers which have very little or even no effect on the ownership of financial institutions. This result comes about from the Bill's provisions relating to share acquisitions in corporations associated with a financial institution, as described above, in combination with the Bill's definition of the term "associate". As the Bill now reads, a 10% ownership interest in a corporation defines the shareholder as an associate of that corporation and of any other firm or individual associated with that corporation.

As a consequence, the Bill would require ministerial review of any share purchase which would raise the holdings of the purchaser together with those of his associates to over 10% in a corporation which has no ownership interest in a financial institution but is associated with a person that does.

Under the corresponding provisions in the predecessor bills to C-56 (Bills C-8 and C-9 of this session of Parliament and C-103 and C-123 of the previous session), share acquisitions involving corporations associated with a financial institution would be reviewable only if the acquisition would result in a transfer of control of the corporation, and a corporation was defined as being associated with another if one was controlled by the other or if both were controlled by the same person.

The reach of the C-56 review provisions is therefore significantly broader than was the case with provisions in the predecessor bills. Beyond the implications of this change for future business decisions in Canada (the effect that the increased uncertainty and administrative burden will have on such decisions), it is also worth noting that the review provisions of C-56 operate retroactively from the date they were first tabled in Parliament: 29th November, 1985, for transactions relating to trust and loan companies, and 26th June, 1986, for transactions relating to insurance companies. As a result, transactions effected in the meantime, and which were not reviewable under the provisions then enunciated, would be made reviewable by Bill C-56 and expose the participants in those transactions to retroactive sanctions.

The Minister has admitted that the existing review provisions of C-56 have a broader reach than was intended. He has tabled amendments with the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, which would revert the provisions of the relevant clauses (10, 44 and 51) to those found in Bills C-8 and C-9.

Return of the review provisions of C-56 to the text of the earlier Bills will not by itself remove all concerns about their retroactive aspect. This is because the criteria set out in the Bill for determining whether or not to approve a reviewable transfer of shares are sufficiently general to allow the Minister to use as one consideration the ownership policy on financial institutions announced in the White Paper of December 1986. Application of that policy, which would limit ownership links between financial and non-financial firms, would clearly alter the significance of the review criteria in the legislation, though the wording would remain the same.

We note, however, that Mr. Hockin has stated that the ownership policy will not be applied to any transaction that occurred prior to the date when that policy was first made public. In his appearance before this Committee, he testified that: "The next instalment of the legislation [on the reform of financial institutions] will state that the restrictions on the creation or strengthening of financial/commercial links will be effective as of December 18, 1986." Together with the proposed amendments described above, this commitment in our view eliminates as an issue of contention the retroactive application of the Bill's provisions on transfers of ownership.

This is not to say that these provisions are no longer contentious. Several of our witnesses, in particular spokesmen for institutions in conglomerate groups with financial firms, expressed concern that these provisions might be used by the Government to implement the ownership policy announced in the White Paper last December. They cited statements by the Minister of State (Finance) indicating that this in fact was his intent. They noted that the ownership policy would form part of the third legislative instalment on financial reform expected later this summer, and argued that it would be inappropriate to grant the Government power to implement a policy which had not yet been debated and approved by Parliament. In their view, therefore, the provisions on transfers of ownership should be deleted from Bill C-56 altogether. Their reintroduction should await public discussion of the merits of the government's announced ownership policy respecting financial institutions.

In his appearance before this Committee, the Minister stated that, in response to these concerns, he has agreed to postpone proclamation of the Bill's clauses pertaining to transfers of ownership until "after Parliament has had the opportunity to discuss the principles of the ownership policy." Clause 57 of the Bill allows proclamation of the Bill's provisions by section.

Appraisal of Asset Values

Provisions in the Bill would expand and clarify the current powers of the Superintendent of Insurance to obtain independent appraisals of real estate assets held by an insurance, trust or mortgage loan company, and to substitute a different value from the one presented by the company. Specifically, these provisions would extend the Superintendent's power in this area to include the valuation of real estate assets of a subsidiary in addition to those of the company itself. The authority of the Superintendent to write-down the values of a company's real estate, loans or investment is also made clearer. The company would be able to appeal such revaluations to the Federal Court.

A corresponding amendment to section 175 of the Bank Act would authorize the Inspector General of Banks to substitute his own appraisal of the value of a bank's assets for that of the bank. While analogous to the provisions respecting the revaluation of assets of non-bank financial institutions, this amendment differs from the latter in that it would apply to all assets, not just real estate.

Departmental officials told the Committee that the proposals respecting the valuations of assets of insurance, trust and loan companies arose from recent experience with some failed trust and loan companies, in which inappropriate valuation of assets was identified as a major contributing factor in the failure. It is a fact, however, that the range of assets held by non-bank financial institutions is widening, and this trend will continue in a more pronounced way with the implementation of the reforms proposed in the Government's White Paper, New Directions for the Financial Sector. As a result, the limits on the powers of the Superintendent to revalue the assets of non-bank financial institutions will prove increasingly confining. Parallel treatment of banks and non-bank financial institutions also argues for broadening the powers of the Superintendent to include all assets in a reappraisal.

In his appearance before the Committee, the Minister acknowledged this issue, and told us that as part of the next legislative package, he "will be giving serious consideration to the suggestion that these revaluation powers be expanded to cover all assets."

Actuarial Reports

Amendments to section 102 of the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act would require property and casualty insurance companies to submit with their annual statements an actuarial report on the adequacy of their reserves to meet existing and expected claims. Representatives of the Insurance Bureau of Canada argued before the Committee that, since reinsurers depend on the companies that cede business to them for the information required to complete the actuarial reports, for professional reinsurers this requirement is very impractical, "even to the point of impossibility in some cases."

When we raised this issue with Mr. Robert Hammond, the Superintendent of Insurance, he responded that reinsurers had the power to insist, as part of the reinsurance contract, that the direct writing company provide them with the information required for the actuarial statement. He also told us that it was his intention to use the powers provided under the Bill, which would allow the Superintendent to specify the information to be included in the actuarial reports, to require direct writing companies to include in their own reports such information as would meet the requirements of the reinsurers.

MOTOR VEHICLE TRANSPORT BILL, 1987

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Finlay MacDonald moved the second reading of Bill C-19, respecting motor vehicle transport by extra-provincial undertakings.

• (1110)

He said: Honourable senators, as you are aware, Bill C-19 and Bill C-18, which was introduced by Senator Macquarrie a few days ago, are companion pieces. They form an overall package of regulatory reforms. Bill C-19, which we are considering today, contains the reforms to economic regulation of extra-provincial trucking and bussing.

This bill has undergone some significant changes since it was first introduced in the other place last November. Members of the Standing Committee on Transport there travelled from coast to coast, listening to Canadians express their satisfaction and, indeed, in some instances, dissatisfaction in some respects with this bill. Provincial governments, of course, have been consulted, and changes have been made after consultations with both the committee and the minister.

As for some background, over the past decades we have seen significant changes in the trucking industry, including changes to the trucks themselves, trucking routes, loads and distances travelled.

In the 1940s the construction of better road networks enabled the industry to begin to spread its wings. The name of the game for truckers was to attract cargo either through expansion of the Canadian market or from Canadian railways.

Trucking, as we know, is a vital and constantly growing part of Canada's national transportation system. As a whole, the trucking industry generates over 70 per cent of total surface rate revenue, and the for-hire segment alone contributes over $6 billion annually to our gross national product.

As an exporting nation, trucking is increasingly important to our exports. In 1984 truckers carried 50 per cent of our exports to the United States. But over the years the relationship between the industry and the government has changed. Since the passage of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act in 1954, the provinces have been responsible for trucking regulation in both their own and the federal government's jurisdiction.

The passage of this act—the 1954 act—also helped the industry to prosper, but its cost was one of limiting entry into the industry and protecting companies already in it through controls administered by individual provincial boards. Each province has its own requirements for safety, entry, commodities, regulation, and so on.

This approach has encumbered the industry and has forced shippers to pay more for their goods. For example, costly and time-consuming hearings are required to obtain an operating licence in each province that a carrier wishes to serve. As the trucking industry has grown and matured, regulation has been admittedly relaxed in all provinces, especially in recent years. This has given truckers a certain amount of freedom, but still the industry remains saddled with a patchwork quilt of regulation which limits growth and innovation. It restricts services, imposes unnecessary costs on the industry and the customers and, ultimately, on the economy as a whole.

Both the provincial and federal governments believe that this is not the way to meet future needs—and I stress both provincial and federal governments. The change is necessary both to enable the trucking industry to continue to prosper and to assist shippers to compete efficiently and effectively in the domestic and United States marketplaces. It was this reasoning which led the federal and provincial governments to agree upon the February 1985 Memorandum of Understanding on which Bill C-19 is based. It was the source of three main initiatives.

First, all jurisdictions agreed to eliminate “public convenience” and “necessity” as an entry test, and to move to a reverse-onus test as soon as possible. That date has been established as the first of next year. I am prepared to elaborate on this section, if requested.

Second, all jurisdictions agree to implement a uniform fitness test, also effective January 1, 1988. This test requires that all applicants have insurance, demonstrate that they can operate safely, and so on. This was approved by all provinces eight months ago. While a test will apply to all extra-provincial traffic, most provinces have agreed to apply it within the province as well.

When Bill C-19 is enacted, it will benefit extra-provincial trucking in several ways. The regulatory emphasis on entry and price control will be shifted to safety performance. Entry into the industry will be directly linked to safe operation. The Governor in Council will be given the power to make national safety regulations for trucks and buses. Administrative responsibility will continue to be delegated to the provinces. There will be a five-year transition period for existing trucking companies to adapt to change.

The transition period during which the regulation will be phased out has been extended from three to five years from January 1, 1983. The extension was made at the request of the majority of the provinces who, after all, have to administer this new regime.

Different provinces view their circumstances differently on this subject, but they did reach a consensus that five years is most appropriate. In the interest of ensuring uniformity in the enactment of the total reform package, the federal government agreed to this amendment.

The extension of the reverse-onus period will result in well over a decade of gradual adjustment to a less-regulated environment in the industry. Some shippers may feel that this is too long a wait. However, the government also listened to the concerns expressed by the provinces and the industry and the five-year period represents a reasonable balance of opinions.

Truckers were among the strong advocates of the reverse-onus test during the negotiation of the federal-provincial agreement, and they will now have more time for adjustment to the January 1993 move to the fitness-only entry test.

In response to uneasiness expressed by a few provinces concerning the final step to fitness only, Bill C-19 includes a provision to study the effect of the reform in the fourth year of the transition phase.

Another issue worthy of elaboration concerns the equal treatment of truckers on both sides of the Canada-U.S. border. In 1982 the United States imposed a moratorium on the issuing of licences to Canadian truckers. The power to reimpose the moratorium remains in the United States law, and, in addition, a bill now before Congress would reinforce and extend this power.

The Minister of Transport and this government believe that if Canadian truckers are treated unfairly in the United States, Canada should be able to reciprocate against American truckers in this country. Because of an amendment approved by the Standing Committee on Transport, Bill C-19 will provide the Governor in Council with this countervailing power.

Given the close economic relationship between the two countries, we do not anticipate that this power will ever need to be invoked, but we are enacting a regulatory regime that is meant to stand the test of time.

When Bill C-19 is enacted, both shippers and carriers will benefit.

There will be less economic regulation through the elimination of the "public convenience" and "necessity" entry test. This will result in less need for costly legal services and considerable saving for truckers.

The remaining regulations on rates and routes to be served will be gradually eliminated, giving both shippers and carriers more flexibility.

Honourable senators, while the Government of Canada has demonstrated flexibility in developing and modifying the economic reforms in Bill C-19, its commitment to safety has never wavered. Safety remains the first priority, and this government has initiated major improvements in the regulation of safety in every mode of transportation.

Federal and provincial governments and industry representatives have cooperated to produce a uniform safety code for trucks and buses. While this bill was in the committee stage in the other place, the governments reached an agreement on implementation and cost sharing. The code now has a concrete existence. All governments are committed to implementing it, and key components will be in place in federal regulations when this bill comes into force on January 1, 1988.

Let us touch briefly on the costs. The Government of Canada will assist in funding implementation of the National Safety Code to a maximum of $23.5 million over the next five years. The federal government will contribute 100 per cent of the development costs of the information exchange system. They will also contribute up to $250,000 per year per province towards additional operating costs for the first five years.

The provinces, for their part, have promised to spend an additional $6 million per year over the same period to improve enforcement. For example, the provinces will hire new enforcement officers and retrain existing ones, if necessary.

The National Safety Code will form the basis of safety regulations in the future. Several key elements of the code will be included in the federal safety regulations. The detailed standards for these regulations will be finalized by August 1987. Hence, once this bill is passed, federal regulations setting out safety requirements for both trucks and buses will be in place by January 1, 1988.

Provincial safety regulations are already in place to control driver qualifications, medical standards, and so on. All provinces have joined the North American Commercial Vehicle Safety Alliance, which sets the standard for roadside inspections of trucks and buses.

Under Bill C-19 and the National Safety Code we shall have the following improvements: A safety requirement for companies to obtain an operating licence. For the first time in legislation, all applicants for an extra-provincial trucking licence will have to meet tough safety standards. Legally the National Safety Code will be adopted in regulations under the new Motor Vehicle Transport Act and under the laws of each province.

There will be uniformity among the provinces. The code will provide the basis for ensuring that safety requirements for extra-provincial traffic are the same in every province. Also, there will be an information exchange among the provinces. Records on safety deficiencies by companies and individual drivers will be kept and transmitted to all provinces.

In addition, existing nationwide safety programs for driver testing and control, vehicle safety enforcement and insurance, and dangerous-goods legislation will be augmented by the following new initiatives to be implemented on or before January 1, 1988: Upgrading the single driver licensing system, which has been in place for 20 years, to enhance enforcement; standardization of the driver licensing classification; modification of medical standards for drivers; modification of regulations for security of loads; a new training course for dangerous goods trainers; and, finally, integration of the Canada Vehicle Safety Alliance with its American counterpart to ensure uniformity throughout North America. They consider this latter initiative as a very significant one, because it will provide a uniform roadside vehicle inspection program.

Regarding administration of the code, it makes good sense from all viewpoints to leave it with the provinces, which have clear jurisdiction over highway safety. It has been noted that nowhere in law is there a delegation of off-the-road safety practices of extra-provincial trucking and bus companies. They have therefore added to Bill C-19 a section which would enable provincial enforcement of safety in the federal jurisdiction.

The costs of trucking service can be held down—and, in some cases, lowered—by reducing the regulatory restrictions on entry, rates and routes. Both the federal and provincial governments are confident that the Canadian trucking industry has matured and is fully capable of meeting the challenge of greater competition that will result from the passage of this bill.

Those benefits will not arise overnight. Similarly, there will be no drastic upheaval in trucking services and no destructive super-heated competition, because the approach to reform has been thoughtful and balanced with a view to ensuring gradual adaptation.

Honourable senators, I commend Bill C-19 for your consideration and approval.

On motion of Senator Turner, debate adjourned.

SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), for the second reading of the Bill C-18, An Act respecting national transportation.—(Honourable Senator Turner).

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, as this great country approaches its one-hundred and twentieth birthday, all Canadians, no matter where they live—east, west, north, south or centre—can look back with great pride knowing that when the Fathers of Confederation sat down in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, to put the Canadian jigsaw pieces together, one of the items they dreamed about, and later talked about, was how to tie each part of this great country together with ribbons of steel. No matter how hard the work, no matter how hard the trials and tribulations and problems of construction, our forefathers gave Canadians three great methods of transportation—first, ships; second, railways; and, third, airlines. Together these systems of transportation have helped Canada serve and survive the war effort during the Boer War, World War I, World War II and the Korean War, and in the process helped our democratic allies protect the great systems of government we all live under.

The National Transportation Act of 1987, Bill C-18, and the Motor Vehicle Transportation Act, Bill C-19, received first reading in the other place on November 4, 1986. Two days later, November 6, 1986, the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1986 received first reading. Bill C-21 was referred to the Senate Transport and Communications Committee on November 27, 1986, for pre-study, and on June 23, 1987, the chairman presented its fifth report. These three bills are very technical and complicated and, therefore, should not be rushed or rubber stamped by the members of this great chamber. It is highly unlikely in our fast moving and changing society that these bills will re-appear before the house before the year 2007, if history follows the pattern it has developed since 1967 when the National Transportation Act was passed.

Bill C-18 consists of 184 pages, 369 clauses, 8 parts or sections which cover the many facets of deregulating air, rail and truck transportation systems in Canada. As a schoolboy in Toronto, I was taught that our Canadian democratic way of life was acclaimed as “government of the people, government by the people and government for the people.” I sometimes wonder what kind of government we have in our country, because having served on the Special Committee on Bill C-22 and having reviewed Bills C-18 and C-19, in my opinion, these bills are the worst pieces of legislation presented in Parliament in many years, because we are not listening to the citizens who will have to operate and live under this new legislation.

Honourable senators, the people of Canada are talking, but no one in government is listening. Good government requires a correct process so that the right results are obtained after long, full and careful public and legislative debate and, if necessary, well thought out amendments. Using this commonsense approach will guarantee full assurance that the public will approve and accept the government sponsored bills. The government of the day is on the verge of changing and making a very historical shift in the public philosophy that has guided the development of Canada's transportation network. Let us be honest with ourselves. The system, with all its problems, is a pretty good system, just waiting for a little new equipment and modernization in some areas of Canada.

Bill C-18 is primarily designed to re-vamp the National Transportation Act brought in in 1967 by the Honourable Jack Pickersgill, the Minister of Transport under the Right Honourable Lester B. Pearson. Its cited purpose is to increase competition in the transportation sector by removing certain regulations that hinder the ability to compete. The transportation modes affected by deregulation measures included in this bill are rail, air and trucking. The major economic benefit that will transpire from this legislation is that Canadian goods and products will get to market at less cost, and more effectively and efficiently. This includes Canadian exports to the U.S., which the government says will reach their destination at a lower cost, thereby increasing their competitiveness.

Every Canadian rail company, commercial airline, private airplane owner, extra-provincial trucking firm and parcel carrier will be affected by this bill in the way in which they are allowed to conduct their business. It is one of the most far-reaching bills in terms of economic implications that this government has introduced to date. Everything from market entry, market exit, safety standards and shipping contracts to the preservation of our commitments to regional economic development are greatly affected by the measures contained in this legislation.

The forerunner of this legislation was a white paper released in July of 1985 by former Minister of Transport, Mr. Don Mazankowski, entitled: "Freedom to Move". The recommendations put forth in that white paper were almost unanimously adopted and form the substance and backbone of Bill C-18.

The Canadian Transport Commission, the CTC, would be eliminated and replaced by a new agency entitled the National Transportation Agency—NTA. Whereas the membership of the commissioners in the CTC numbered 17, the NTA would have nine new members. Presently a commissioner of the CTC is appointed for a maximum term of ten years. The new NTA would have commissioners appointed to five-year terms. Contrary to the present system under the CTC, the minister will now have the authority to issue policy directions to the new agency, thereby severely limiting its independence and ability to function as a regulating body.

Whereas the CTC previously recommended policy directions to the minister, who then acted on them forthwith, the minister will now direct his policy initiatives to the new agency, which would then research the feasibility of those initiatives. Therefore, the CTC would lose its status and recognition as the constant permanent resource body for transport policy initiative while its expertise and knowledge would now be used as a research support unit for policy direction emanating from the minister's office.

The railway companies—CN and CP—will be allowed to enter into what is called confidential contracts with large bulk shippers. In other words, the rates charged by the railway company to the shipper will be permitted to remain confidential and will no longer have to be published. Also, any rebate or allowance provided by a railway company on a published rate will be allowed to remain confidential. As a consequence of this new regulation, rail rates will fall. Large bulk shippers will clearly benefit by negotiating favourable low rates for their voluminous shipments. Another sure consequence will be that railway company revenues will decrease by exactly the same amount as the rates for shippers decrease.

Three major problems arise from confidential contracts: First, the small and medium-sized non-bulk shippers would be cross-subsidizing the rate decreases to the large bulk shippers in order to offset the loss of revenue to the railway companies; second, Canadian Pacific Railway, Canada's only other railway company besides CN, a federal crown corporation, feels that in competing with CN to offer the lowest rate to shippers through confidential contracts, it would not be able to absorb nearly as much lost revenue as would CN and, as a result, would be bankrupt by the year 1992. Third, the trucking industry would not be allowed to enter into confidential contracts and would, therefore, be made subject to unfair competition. Industry representatives fear that pressures to reduce rates would greatly weaken several Canadian trucking firms and render them vulnerable to foreign takeovers, especially by the huge U.S. trucking companies.

This bill contains no provisions setting any limitation on foreign takeovers of Canadian transportation companies. The only guidelines are these:

1. All mergers and takeovers over $20 million and over 10 per cent of the voting shares of a Canadian transportation firm will be reviewed by the Governor in Council;
2. All mergers below these set ceilings will be reviewed by Investment Canada under the normal procedure;

The guiding principle in this section is that all investment that "has been found, or has been deemed to have been found, likely to be of net benefit to Canada" will be approved.

The major difficulty with this is that it leaves all acquisitions over $20 million by foreign investors at the discretion of the Governor in Council. In other words, patronage and ideology become very important players in a most vital element of Canada's economy. The Liberal Party finds this totally unacceptable. Even in a country as economically powerful as the U.S., a 25 per cent limitation on foreign ownership of American transportation companies is firmly in place.

We fear that many good Canadian companies will pass into foreign hands. The Conservative government has chosen to take an unnecessary and unusual risk while disregarding the importance of securing Canadian ownership of the transportation industry. By leaving the entire matter to the discretion of the minister responsible for Investment Canada and the Governor in Council, and by not setting a statutory limitation on foreign ownership, the government has opted to leave the door open to foreign ownership of a sector that is most crucial to the economic well-being of Canada.

New legislation does not include a "notwithstanding" clause binding the bill to a regional development priority. Regional development priorities and agreements must never be abrogated by transportation policy initiatives that fail to recognize the unique needs of the more-distant and remote regions of this country. Without such a statement prefacing the legislation, it is evident that there will be a negative effect on regional development. Until now, regulation has been the mechanism used to alleviate several regional economic development problems. In an unfettered, deregulated transportation environment, government intervention will no longer be possible.

The Conservative government does not accept the degree of importance which we in the Liberal Party attached to the area of economic regional development. Such a position, in our view, is clearly unacceptable and demonstrates a lack of sensitivity to the fact that Canada is a nation with a relatively sparse population distributed over the second largest land mass of any country in the world.

As this bill is now written, there are no provisions for safeguards which would protect the regions from reductions in service, route and rail line abandonments and other eventualities. We feel that in a highly competitive environment—which, with deregulation, is predictable—it is vital that some form of protection against loss of service in any part of Canada be put in place.

● (1140)

Despite all the good words and the allusions to national reconciliation and a new era in federal-provincial relations, the Tory government is again showing us its true colours. Indeed, the new legislation does not incorporate in its declaration of principles an important resolution which was adopted unanimously at the annual Premiers' Conference held last August in St. John's, Newfoundland. This resolution stated that any transportation policy must have, as an underlying principle, the realization of regional economic development.

In addition, on December 3, 1986, the Council of Maritime Premiers resolved to apply the pressure on the present government for an amendment to the bill before us today to ensure that economic development objectives would take precedence over commercial viability objectives of a transportation service when the two conflict.

We regret that the legislation contains no safeguards preventing situations that would effectively reduce safety standards in the airline industry from arising. The American experience has shown us that this is a real danger. Our position is based on four major observations.

1. Deregulation brings on a substantial increase in competition, which, in lean and more difficult times, leads to few remaining options in cost-cutting strategies. At these stressful periods, a lesser managerial integrity will lead to cost-cutting in maintenance, monitoring, inspection and verification of aircraft.

2. Deregulation strongly encourages new entries by relaxing the regulations for entry. These new companies often enter with inexperienced and improperly trained employees to maintain aircraft.

3. Deregulation impacts on established and new carriers to demand concessions from their employees. These often lead to longer working hours, stress, job insecurity, lower wages and fatigue, which are all causes to a higher risk of human error.

4. In the United States of America, the Federal Aviation Administration, (FAA), in 1979, had 2,000 inspectors monitoring 237 air carriers. In 1984 it had 1,300 inspectors for 407 air carriers.

We believe that these four situations speak for themselves. There is no possible way that these direct consequences of deregulation can increase safety standards. They can only act to decrease them. We recommend that before deregulation is allowed to flourish fully in Canada, the federal government introduce the necessary measures to protect the traveller from these serious dangers.

[Senator Turner.]

To compound the problem even further, in his report to the House of Commons for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1985, Auditor General Kenneth Dye stated:

... none of the Transport Canada regions was able to inspect all carriers in its jurisdiction at least once a year.

This means that several air carriers in Canada that year went without any inspection whatsoever. These are not what we call high safety standards, and by no means should deregulation be introduced until strict and unequivocal safety measures are put in place. Any policy which in any minute way puts in peril the safety of airline travellers in Canada will be vehemently opposed by the Liberal Party of Canada.

In addition, a source of concern to all Canadians is the increased incidence of trucking accidents in the United States since the passage of the Motor Carrier Act of 1980. Bills C-18 and C-19 both refer to the need to ensure safety. We are concerned that this objective will only be met if we have in place, as quickly as possible, a uniform national highway safety code. Some agreement will have to be reached whereby the federal government will take the lead to have the provinces implement and enforce a uniform national highway safety code.

Today in the Toronto Star it said:

New Trucking Legislation Scraps Regulated Rates and Calls for Safety Code

But industry representatives said yesterday, after Bill C-19 was passed, that the new bill doesn't contain adequate safety provisions and could result in a deterioration in highway safety. "We're very concerned about the safety implications," said Ken Maclaren, Vice-President of the Canadian Trucking Association. "The safety provisions are unenforceable, and it looks like it will be a year or two before a new national safety code is in place."

Raymond Cope, President of the Ontario Trucking Association, said in a statement, "Deregulation experience in the United States and Australia has clearly indicated that highway safety will sharply deteriorate if comprehensive safety regulations governing the driver, the truck and the hours of permissible service are not in place and actively enforced."

It is also stated:

Cope said the promise by Transport Minister John Crosbie to have the code in place by 1990 is not good enough.

"These regulations must be in place by the end of 1987 or Canadians will be exposed to unsafe highway operations, preventable accidents, injuries and fatalities."

In the course of the year past, the minister promoted his "Freedom to Move" deregulation package by telling Canadians that airfares on Canadian airlines would drop as a result of deregulation. Meanwhile, both the presidents of the former CP Air and Air Canada stated that air fares had reached bottom.

In short, the Canadian consumer has been duped once again in being led to believe that air fares would drop considerably as a result of deregulation. The minister himself confirmed this last June when he declared that the new National Transportation Act would not influence air fares toward a downward trend.

Employees in the airline industry face massive layoffs and displacement. Deregulation was introduced in 1978 in the United States. From 1978 to 1985, 40,000 airline employees lost their jobs. The legislation contains no provisions whatsoever to protect employment in the airline industry. Nothing in this bill would bind airline companies to compensate displaced workers or to give fair warnings before layoffs.

It is believed that increased competition will lead to the cutting of costs, a movement towards a "no frills" strategy, route abandonment, and a greater propensity to failure, all of which will lead to reduced employment opportunities and layoffs.

The legislation offers absolutely no provisions that would offset the probable negative impact that deregulation would have on labour in the transportation sector, despite the evidence in black and white of the dislocation problems encountered in the United States as a result of deregulation.

We strongly propose that safeguards be legislated and that new labour-management agreements be encouraged in our country. Agreements dealing with security, classification and retraining in the airline industry would have eased the impact of employment loss.

We are very happy that the new legislation does deal specifically with the accessibility, comfort, safety and rate structure for the handicapped on all modes of transportation. I sincerely hope and stress that mandatory minimum safety and access standards for the handicapped have been incorporated into the new National Transportation Act.

In closing, I wish to read into the record a letter dated June 16, 1987, from the President of Transport 2000 to the Honourable Lowell Murray. Honourable senators, this letter says it all. Transport 2000 is a good corporation, and a good watchdog for all Canadian transportation systems.

● (1150)

Transport 2000 Canada is a non-partisan, non-profit organization founded to promote public transportation and to represent the interests of consumers in the field of transportation.

Very shortly, the Parliament of Canada will give third and final readings to Bills C-18 and C-19, acts with respect to the deregulation of transportation in Canada. Transport 2000 is writing to request that the Senate of Canada carefully review these bills by holding public hearings and proposing amendments where such amendments can be considered as constructive improvements to the legislation.

Transport 2000 would point out that the passage of Bills C-18 and C-19 has been extremely rushed.

The hearings of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Transport accommodated only half of the individuals and groups wishing to testify. To me, that is absolutely wrong.

Although amendments to these bills were proposed, closure was invoked in order to limit debate.

One hundred amendments suggested by the opposition parties were not even considered.

The new transportation legislation does not serve the public interest in at least three different respects. First, it does not insist on the highest possible safety standards in transportation. Second, regional economic development concerns are not given precedence over strict cost-recovery considerations in the event of service withdrawals and abandonments. Finally, the concept of public convenience and necessity is not being applied to the rural areas and smaller centres across Canada, except in the far north.

Transport 2000 is concerned that this legislation as presently formulated will work against a balanced national transportation network serving the needs of all regions fairly and equitably. We sincerely believe that the Senate of Canada, through its processes of deliberation, can offer constructive and reasonable improvements to Bills C-18 and C-19 which will be acceptable to all parties.

Honourable senators, in my opinion, Bill C-18 and Bill C-19 are almost a direct copy of the American system of deregulation. They will cause severe hardship for some regions of the country, and will allow large trucking firms to gobble up smaller ones. They will open Canada up to large American companies without giving our Canadian companies access to the American markets.

It is possible that these bills will allow our American competitors into competition with Canadian rail and truck carriers when Canadians will not have the same ease of access to American transportation markets, because of various legislative restrictions, thus affecting jobs and Canadian control of the industries.

In other words, it will be an open season, and all Canadians will suffer, as one way or another Canadian shippers will use American railroads because of the request for the inter-switching of rail cars from one railway to another, and because of the expansion of the inter-switching right of 18.6 miles or 30 kilometres.

This provision, in my opinion, will allow customers to benefit from greater access to competing Canadian and American rail lines. Canadian railroads will no doubt suffer sharp decreases in revenue, which will mean that they will not have the capital funds to maintain track and equipment; thus, a deterioration of future service for all Canadians.

Honourable senators, if it ain't broke, why fix it?

Let's modernize it, and we will be able to compete in a fast, economical way, giving Canadians once again the best type of transportation system in the great country we all love and call Canada.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate until Monday. Incidentally, I should say that I am doing so to give any other honourable senator an opportunity to speak to this matter. I do not intend to do so myself.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

PRIVATE BILL

REGIONAL VICAR FOR CANADA OF THE PRELATURE OF THE HOLY CROSS AND OPUS DEI—SECOND READING—POINT OF ORDER—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bélisle, seconded by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, for the second reading of the Bill S-7, An Act to incorporate the Regional Vicar for Canada of the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei.—(Honourable Senator Corbin).

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. I should like to draw to the attention of all honourable senators that Senator Corbin's stance on Bill S-7 is far from being fair to this bill. It has been on the Orders of the Day since April 2. I have, since June 2, asked Senator Corbin when he will speak to the matter. Last night, when we adjourned, I went to him and asked him again if he was going to speak today. His reply was: "Senator, when will you be taking your retirement? Then I will speak." This, honourable senators, was not considered by me to be a humorous joke.

Yesterday, in the debate on the private bill, Senators Flynn and Frith agreed that the purpose of the second reading of a private bill was to send it to the committee where questions could be asked of the witnesses. Then the committee may make up its own mind regarding the principle of the bill.

We have heard many things during this debate, mainly, not to say exclusively, one side of the story. I think it appropriate to underline that the most elementary principle of natural justice demands that both sides of a story be heard. All that I told you in my speech introducing the second reading of the bill holds true, but so many false accusations have been made against the Prelature Opus Dei and its members that justice warrants a fair hearing. This bill should be referred to committee.

Hon. Jean Le Moyne: Honourable senators, I would like to say to Senator Bélisle that Senator Corbin was only cordially pulling his leg. It was just a joke. Senator Corbin is not yet ready to speak. The legal aspects of the thing are very complicated. He will speak when he is ready—probably next week, perhaps later, but he will speak, and all justice will be granted to Opus Dei.

Order stands.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

On the Order:

[Senator Frith.]

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have spoken to the leadership opposite. Senators will remember that we were hoping to begin with a witness from government, and then have our former colleague, Senator Forsey, appear as a witness. The government is not in a position to offer such a witness or witnesses at the present time. We therefore propose that Senator Forsey appear today, and he is ready to do so. The idea is that he will start by giving us a chance to consider his position. Then he will come back to join us again on Monday or Tuesday.

I move that we resolve ourselves into Committee of the Whole for that purpose.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Is Senator Forsey here?

Senator Frith: Yes.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Before the motion is put, honourable senators, if I recall correctly, there was a discussion when the motion was made to invite witnesses to the floor of the Senate concerning the position of the table. I see that the table is still in its previous position. Where will the witness' table be? Will all honourable senators have the privilege of watching the witness, or will we just watch the back of his head?

Senator Frith: There is no doubt that we did not get together on that question as we ought to have. I suggest that for today we proceed the way we did on our consideration of the Canada-France Fisheries and Boundaries Agreement, but that we try between now and Monday to decide on a better position, because we all agree that it should be done that way.

• (1200)

Senator Doody: Perhaps Senator Forsey could sit on each side for 15 minutes!

CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONTINUED

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to, the Honourable Senator Gildas L. Molgat in the Chair.

Senator Phillips: Mr. Chairman, do we have a witness?

The Chairman: Yes, we do. Senator Forsey is just being called. The difficulty is that it was impossible to tell in advance exactly when we would reach this item. Senator Forsey is, indeed, in the building.

Senator Doody: He is in the precinct.

The Chairman: He is within the precinct.

Senator Phillips: In Senator MacEachen's office, I assume.

Senator Frith: He is in yours, as a matter of fact. He is certainly in an office provided for him by the government—

Senator MacEachen: By the government whip.

Senator Frith: That was nice of you, indeed.

Senator Phillips: I will go and get him if you wish.

Senator Frith: Having started out doing something so gracious, do not be ungracious now.

The Chairman: In any case, I saw him personally this morning in room 677-F, so I know that he is present.

Senator Marshall: Mr. Chairman, since you are chairman of the Rules Committee and this Committee of the Whole, do you know if there is any rule to deny a former senator from appearing in the chamber after he has retired?

The Chairman: I know of nothing.

Senator Flynn: Senator Forsey is now here.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, the Honourable Eugene Forsey was escorted to a seat in the Senate Chamber.

The Chairman: Honourable Senator Forsey, welcome back to this chamber where you worked so well and so hard for many years. I need not add very much; you heard the applause of your previous colleagues.

On a personal note, I wish to say how pleased I am to see you. You and I were summoned here on the same day in October 1970. Subsequently, our first work, as you will recall, was on the Joint Committee on the Constitution. We find ourselves now back in the same position, so I have a personal word of welcome.

I presume, Senator Forsey, that you have a statement with which you would like to begin, and, after that, we will have questions.

[Translation]

Hon. Eugene Forsey: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Honourable senators, I wish first to thank you from the bottom of my heart for your invitation to appear before you. It is not only an honour and a duty, but also a pleasure to find myself once more in this chamber.

[English]

As I once heard Sir Robert Borden say, under somewhat similar circumstances, "This seems like old times."

I should like to start by saying that there are a number of points I want to try to deal with in this matter of the Meech Lake accord. On some of them you may find me somewhat critical; on others you may find me surprisingly uncritical. I should hope that no one will accuse me of being—as I was once called when I was discussing similar matters many years ago—an bigot Anglo-Saxon. Perhaps I may suffer the same fate that I once suffered after a speech at Couchiching on the question of Quebec and the rest of us—French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians—when two people came up to me. One of them said, "You are inspired by hatred of Quebec;" the other came up to me and said, "You have sold out to the French Canadians."

I will try to give you as carefully considered a set of comments on this accord as I can. I trust that I shall not be found particularly prejudiced one way or the other, but that, of course, is a matter of opinion.

The first thing that I want to look at is the provisions dealing with Quebec as a "distinct society" and the principle of linguistic duality.

With both of those as general propositions, I am in complete, and indeed, ardent sympathy, but I think there are certain problems that arise in connection with the principles as they are embodied in the accord.

● (1210)

By way of preliminary, I have been told by some people that the statement that the Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted in a manner consistent with the principle of duality and the recognition of Quebec as a distinct society does not apply to the courts at all, that it is simply a matter for Parliament and the legislatures. I think that is nonsense. I think it is quite clear that this would apply to the courts, that they are being told that they must interpret the Constitution in a manner consistent with these two principles.

The first question I ask myself is: What exactly is meant by "a distinct society"? Does this mean a dominantly French-speaking society or a bicultural society with an immense French-speaking majority? Putting it another way: What exactly is the position of the English-speaking minority in Quebec in this distinct society?

I feel rather strongly about the necessity of being clear on this, because I was for 16 years a member of the English-speaking minority in Quebec. I had every expectation at that time of being a Montrealer and a Quebecker for the rest of my life. I have lived most of my life in, or on the edge of, Quebec. My roots in Quebec go back more than a century. Two of my grandparents and four of my great-grandparents were members of the English-speaking minority. Accordingly, I am intensely interested and concerned about the position of that minority in the distinct society.

The principle of duality is affirmed to be a "fundamental characteristic of Canada," and Parliament, the legislatures and the courts are ordered to preserve it and to interpret the Constitution accordingly. One reading of this is that this means, simply, to preserve the existing situation with respect to the rights of the French-speaking minorities in the nine provinces and the English-speaking minority in Quebec. This is presumably bolstered by subsection (4), which states:

Nothing in this section derogates from the powers, rights or privileges of Parliament or the Government of Canada, or of the legislatures or governments of the provinces, including any powers, rights or privileges relating to language.

If you read it that way, it would leave the French-speaking minorities in the nine provinces in what many of them would consider to be an unsatisfactory position. It would also leave the English-speaking minority in Quebec in a position that most of them would consider highly unsatisfactory.

It seems to me that the better reading of the order to Parliament, the legislatures and the courts to preserve the fundamental characteristic is that if Parliament or a legislature is not, in the opinion of the minority, living up to its duty of preserving the fundamental characteristic, the minority can appeal to the courts to order Parliament or the legislatures to enact whatever the courts consider necessary to fulfil the constitutional obligation.

The Supreme Court of Canada did this in the Manitoba language case. The Supreme Court of the United States did it in the matter of redistributing seats in the state legislatures and in the case of Brown vs. the Board of Education. I may have the name wrong in that instance, but senators who are learned in the law can easily correct me on that. In any event, there was a case of that sort.

It will probably be argued that subsection (4) prevents this by declaring that nothing in the section derogates from the powers, rights or privileges of Parliament or of the legislatures; but "derogate from" seems to me to imply lessening, taking away from. What about ordering Parliament or a legislature to exercise its powers in a certain way required by the Constitution? The powers would remain, but their exercise would be subject to the new provisions of the accord.

It seems to me significant that the subsection does not adopt the wording of section 36(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, which states:

Without altering the legislative authority of Parliament or of the provincial legislatures, or the rights of any of them with respect to the exercise of their legislative authority, . . .

Why was this wording not adopted in subsection (4) of the Meech Lake proposal? Section 36(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982 keeps the courts right out. Does subsection (4)?

If subsection (4) of the accord means the same as section 36(1) of the Constitution Act, 1982, then the principle of duality really offers the minorities nothing, and is just "words and breath and of no force to oblige a man at all." The minorities are left precisely where they now are.

Subsection (3) affirms the role of the legislature and Government of Quebec to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec as a distinct society within Canada. This raises again the question of what this distinct society really is and the place of the English-speaking minority in it. If subsection (2) really gives the courts power to order the Quebec legislature so to exercise its powers as to preserve the principle of duality, then this should look after the rights of the English-speaking minority. But, if that minority appealed to them to do so, the courts would probably be faced with the constitutional requirement that they must interpret the Constitution in a manner consistent with a recognition of Quebec as a distinct society, and might hold that this overruled the obligation to preserve duality.

M. Rémillard has already claimed that if the Supreme Court of Canada rules that unilingual signs are unconstitutional, the Quebec legislature can make them constitutional by exercising its power to promote the distinct identity of Quebec. In other words, the French-speaking minorities in the nine provinces might find that the principle of duality enables them to get rights which the legislatures of the nine provinces can now deny them. For example, the right to speak French in the debates of the legislatures of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Ontario, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland.

I speak with some feeling on this, because a little over a fortnight ago I appeared before a committee of the Alberta legislature to defend the right of M. Piquette to ask a question in French. I heard some very peculiar law against my contention. I think I gave a reasonably good account of myself, but I was obliged to admit that though I thought M. Piquette had the right, I thought also that the Alberta legislature could take it away from him.

The English-speaking minority in Quebec might find the principle of duality gave them nothing, indeed, that the principle of the distinct society gave the Quebec legislature and government the power to take away such rights as they now have. In other words, that what was sauce for the French goose was not sauce for the English gander.

If the principle of duality is not to be sheer humbug, and if the autonomy of Parliament and the provincial legislatures, and the rights of the English-speaking minority in Quebec are to be preserved, let alone enhanced, these ambiguities and obscurities, in my opinion, need to be cleared up. Parliament, the legislatures, the minorities and the public generally need to know exactly what we are in for.

The second feature of the accord that I should like to consider is the provisions with regard to the Senate. First of all, the government of a province "may" submit names for appointment. What if it does not? What if it submits a list of names none of which satisfies the national government? But the accord also says that the national government "shall" appoint from the list. Why the different verbs?

A second minor point is the use of the term "the Queen's Privy Council for Canada." The names must be acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada. I should have expected the term used would be "the Governor General in Council." I am really surprised by the use of "the Queen's Privy Council for Canada," because that has over 200 members, and I cannot help wondering whether there is going to be an attempt to bring the Queen's Privy Council for Canada together to find out whether the nominations are acceptable to it.

I do not think there is any legal quorum for the Queen's Privy Council for Canada. There was up to 1878 in the Governor-General's Instructions, but it was dropped then, and, as far I know, there is now no legal quorum for the Queen's Privy Council for Canada. Incidentally, this provision would change the method of actual appointment, which, as you all know, is now done by instrument of advice signed by the Prime Minister alone. It would go back to what it used to be—to whatever was the date, in the 1950s or the 1960s—to being an Order-in-Council appointment. At present it is simply by the Prime Minister alone; but it would go back to the old way.

● (1220)

Those are, in effect, minor points, points of draftsmanship, and I have no claim to expertise in the matter of draftsmanship. I may be completely wrong on these. But there is a more serious aspect of the proposals on the Senate.

Under the Constitution Act, 1982, section 42, any change in the method of selecting senators, any change in the powers of the Senate, any change in the numbers from any province, any change in the residence qualification must have the approval of seven provinces whose populations amount to at least 50 per cent of the total population of the ten provinces. Now, that was a pretty stiffish requirement. In my judgment, as I have said repeatedly both before committees and in writing, this meant that, in fact, any change in the Senate involving a constitutional amendment had as much chance of being adopted as I have of becoming Archbishop of Canterbury, Pope or Dalai Lama. Now, that may be regarded as mere persiflage or rhetorical exaggeration on my part. But I think it would be agreed that it would not be easy, even under the existing provisions, to make changes in the Senate requiring constitutional amendments.

For instance, if you look at the famous Triple-E, that starts off by saying "six senators from every province." Well, of course, the western provinces would say, "That's fine." Newfoundland would say, "That's all right." Prince Edward Island would probably give a whoop of joy. I have even sometimes facetiously suggested that they would say, "This solves our unemployment problem." But when you take it to Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—I am part Nova Scotian and my wife is a New Brunswicker. I know something about Nova Scotia and New Brunswick—I can just see Nova Scotia and New Brunswick saying, "What, drop from ten to six? What else will the upper Canadians think of to put us in a bad position? Haven't they taken it out of us enough as it is?"

Then you come to Quebec, and you say, "You will go down from 24 to six". At that point Quebec just goes right up into the stratosphere and doesn't come down until the twelfth of July, if then. You put it to Ontario that it is 24 down to six, and you get the same kind of reaction.

The thing is cold. You simply could not get those four provinces to accept. Four from ten leaves six. If you haven't got your seven provinces, forget it.

That is why I am inclined to say—and I am afraid I am using very rough language here—that the Premier of Alberta on this Triple-E thing has been sold a pup.

But the fact remains that if you are going to say, "Any of these changes will require the consent of every single provincial legislature," you are going to make it even more difficult to make any changes in the Senate involving a constitutional amendment. The changes that the Senate can make itself, the changes that Parliament can make by ordinary statute, would, of course, still be perfectly possible and perfectly easy.

Well, that seems to me to require some thought. I wonder why it is really necessary to make this requirement of unanimi-ty for all these changes. The problem so far as Quebec is concerned I think could have been met very easily and very satisfactorily by saying that in any changes under the seven-province formula, Quebec would have to have a specific minimum proportion of the seats in the Senate.

Now, the other aspect of this about the Senate is that arising from the fact that, as I have said, the chances of getting any constitutional amendments relating to the Senate are going to be very slim, indeed, the probability is that the supposedly temporary, interim arrangement, by which until this glorious day of transcendent Senate reform arrives, the seats will be filled as they become vacant from lists submitted by the provinces.

Well, now, I myself have no particular objection to that. I think it might give us, in some respects, a more active and a better balanced Senate than we have had in the past. I hope that does not sound disrespectful of my late colleagues or of those who have come to the Senate since I faded out. But I think that when the day arrives when the majority, let alone all of the members of the Senate, are people appointed from lists submitted by the provinces, I think you would unquestionably have a much more powerful Senate. It would have exactly the same legal powers as the Senate has now—notably, of course, the power to veto any bill absolutely and forever, repeatedly—but it would have far more political clout.

The members would not have the inhibitions that the senators appointed in the present manner have; and some of them might get very rough indeed. They might say, "What does the House of Commons think it is? We are here to look after the regions. We are here to look after the provinces. We were nominated by our provinces with that specifically in mind. So the House of Commons wants to do such and such, does it? Well, we don't think that ought to be done. We think we have a right to say, 'No'. We were supposed originally to be the sober second thought of the country. We were supposed to stop the House of Commons from wild, radical, what would now be called left-wing excesses."

But they might say, "But what about stopping the House of Commons from wild, radical right-wing excesses?"

There have been some examples recently of bills coming up from the House of Commons to the Senate that I think someone might argue were right-wing excesses. Now, that's a matter of opinion. All I am saying is you may get out of this temporary, interim provision for the Senate a much more powerful Senate. I don't know how the NDP people would like that. I presume they would not like it at all. They, of course, might come back and say, "Oh, don't bother about that. We are going to abolish the blankety-blank thing anyway." But for that they would need unanimous consent of the provinces, which I think they have remarkably little chance of getting.

So, I think that the supposedly interim proposal for the Senate is likely to be all the Senate reform we will get for a very long time, and it may have results which some people who are enthusiastic about the proposals generally may tend to cavil at.

The third point I would like to touch on particularly—and I hope, Mr. Chairman and honourable senators, if you find me unduly long-winded, you will apply closure with a firm hand—are the provisions with regard to immigration and aliens. These, I think, are exceedingly complex. On the details of them I am not in the least competent to pronounce, and I shall not attempt to do so. I think the details probably need very careful scrutiny by people familiar with immigration matters and immigration law. I am not. I simply suggest that it might be useful to have evidence from people with those qualifications. But there are a few points which I think I can make which are rather general.

The accord provides that an agreement with a province that is proclaimed after approval by Parliament and the provincial legislatures overrides pro tanto section 91 of the act of 1867, head 25, “naturalization and aliens”, and the paramountcy of national legislation under section 95. This, by itself, might wipe out Parliament’s power over naturalization and aliens, or severely limit it, and the paramountcy of national legislation over immigration.

But it is qualified by a provision that preserves Parliament’s power to set, by act of Parliament:

national standards and objectives relating to immigration or aliens, including any provision that establishes general classes of immigrants or relates to levels of immigration for Canada or that prescribes classes of individuals who are inadmissible into Canada.

Well, what else of Parliament’s powers would remain? That is a question that I should like to see answered. I think there is an ancient Latin phrase inclusio unius, exclusio alterius, or something of that sort. I think it raises problems.

I would like to point out here that in contrast to the section on the spending power, the national standards and objectives are to be set by an act of Parliament. Now, the “national standards and objectives” are to apply to aliens as well as immigrants; but the “including” does not mention aliens. How much of Parliament’s present exclusive power over naturalization and aliens will remain? Is there any possibility that the provinces will get into, by a sort of back door, the naturalization process or the citizenship process? Probably not, but I think it needs scrutiny.

● (1230)

The provinces get control over “the temporary admission of aliens.” What precisely does “temporary” mean there? Years ago here there used to be a class of public servants known as “permanent temporaries”. They were temporary employees who were re-appointed at the end of their six-month term, and this went on and on for years. I am a little afraid there may be some permanent-temporary aspects to this measure.

The next point is that an amendment to an agreement that has secured force of law may be made by proclamation after approval by Parliament and the provincial legislature concerned—that is normal under the act of 1982—or “in such manner as is set out in the agreement.” What does this mean—by a federal order in council, by a provincial order in council, by federal and provincial orders in council taken together, or what? Why is this alternative method of amendment inserted, and what does it mean?

The new section 95E appears to add a condition to the general amending formula in regard to the new provisions in relation to immigration and aliens. The seven-province formula would apply, but only if the legislatures of all the provinces that have agreements approved. What if only six provinces have agreements?

The principles of the Cullen-Couture Agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of Quebec are to be incorporated into a new agreement to be given the force of law under the provisions of the new sections 95A to 95E. The new agreement—and all provinces will be entitled to substantially the same—will cover:

—the selection abroad and in Canada of independents, immigrants, visitors for medical treatment, students and temporary workers, the selection of refugees abroad and economic criteria for family reunification and assisted relatives.

The federal authorities will withdraw services (except citizenship services) for the reception and integration (including linguistic and cultural) of all foreign nationals wishing to settle in Quebec, where services are to be provided by Quebec with such withdrawal to be accompanied by reasonable compensation.

The compensation would, of course, be paid by Canada to Quebec, and its amount, in case of dispute as to what was reasonable, would presumably be settled by the courts.

Those provisions cover a great deal of ground. If it is to be made part of the Constitution, it needs very careful scrutiny, especially as it can be extended to every province.

There may be solid reasons for giving Quebec special powers in this matter.

Parenthetically, I would like to say that I am never terrified by the idea of giving special powers to a particular province or group of provinces. It all depends on what the powers are. Various provinces have special status now in regard to certain matters. My native province of Newfoundland has a very special status with regard to education. Saskatchewan and Alberta have special status with regard to education. Quebec has special status with regard to its civil law, and certain provinces have special status in regard to bilingualism. I see no difficulty with special status as such. I see no difficulty in principle with Quebec having special status with regard to immigration. If it is to have this special status under the Constitution, it requires very careful scrutiny to see that what is in the Cullen-Couture Agreement is fully warranted.

However, to my mind, it does not follow that because you give these powers to Quebec, you should necessarily give them to all the other provinces. I suppose you can argue that almost any province in this country is a distinct society. Certainly I could argue that that was true of Newfoundland. After all, we in Newfoundland were once an independent dominion. No other province in Canada can say that. We had our High Commissioner in London, and we could have had diplomats all over the world, if we had been rich enough and foolish enough. Nobody else can say that. However, that is by the way. The point I am really making is that it does not follow logically that because you give a certain power in this matter to Quebec it has to be given to all the other provinces. I think the question of whether this power should or should not be given deserves scrutiny.

I come now to the most peculiar feature of these proposals on immigration, that the Constitution would:

—guarantee that Quebec will receive a number of immigrants, including refugees, within the annual total established by the federal government for all of Canada proportionate to its share of the population of Canada, with the right to exceed that figure by 5 per cent for demographic reasons.

Quebec's proportion of the total population of Canada, according to the latest figures I could get, is around 25, 26 or 27 per cent. Let us say for convenience that it is 25 per cent, though that it not quite large enough. Suppose the federal government sets the total immigration for a given year at 100,000. This means Quebec is guaranteed 25,000, 26,000 or 27,000 with the right to an extra 5,000. How can anyone guarantee that Quebec will get 30,000 of the 100,000 that has been set as the total for the whole country? This guarantee reminds me of a proposal in the original NDP platform in 1961 for a guaranteed full employment act, a proposal on which I made some sardonic comments at the time. Can the federal government guarantee that 25,000 or 30,000 immigrants will land at Dorval, Mirabel, Quebec City or any other particular port of entry? Can it guarantee that if they do land there they will stay? If they land in Quebec, must they go through the formalities under the constitutionalized agreement with Quebec? What will their status be under sections 95A to 95E? These are questions I should like to see cleared up. It may be that I am being obtuse, but I have tried these questions on a variety of people whose experience, knowledge and intelligence I respect, and they have been as baffled by them as I have.

Suppose that only 18,000 immigrants—which I believe is somewhere near the average over a number of years—go to Quebec. Will there be an attempt then to say, "Well, they are supposed to be guaranteed 30 per cent." In other words, the total will have to be adjusted downwards, and the number left to the rest of the country will have to be adjusted accordingly so that 18,000 will be 30 per cent of the total. That would mean, if my arithmetic is not astray, that the national total must be cut from 100,000 to 70,000, and the quota for the rest of the country from 70,000 to 42,000. I wonder what is involved in this guarantee which, on the face of it, looks to me most peculiar.

The fourth main point I want to deal with is the provision regarding the Supreme Court of Canada. Quebec is guaranteed "at least" three judges, instead of the present three. I was struck by the phrase "at least" introduced there. I have no particular objection to it, but I was struck by it in that it is something new.

When a vacancy occurs, the government of "each" province "may" submit to the federal government for appointment the names of members of the bar of that province who have been members of that bar for ten years or judges of "any court in Canada" for at least ten years. The federal government can appoint the Chief Justice from among the members of the court without getting the approval of the provinces. Other appointments it "shall" make from the lists submitted by the provincial governments. Where the federal government is appointing any of the obligatory three judges from Quebec it must appoint someone from the list submitted by the Government of Quebec. It would seem that the government of any province could submit for appointment the name of any member of the bar of that province who has been a judge of any court in Canada for at least ten years. Some lawyers are members of the bar of more than one province. So, apparently the Government of Alberta could submit for appointment—except in the case of the appointment of one of the obligatory Quebec three—the name of an Alberta barrister who had been a judge of any court in any other province for ten years.

• (1240)

If the federal government chose to appoint a fourth judge from Quebec, any province could submit the name of a member of the Quebec bar who had been a judge of any court for ten years.

Also, apparently no one could be appointed from the bar of the Yukon or of the Northwest Territories, and there is, of course, no provision for the territorial governments to submit names. Any appointment must be "acceptable to the Queen's Privy Council for Canada"—in other words, the Government of Canada. What happens, however, if you have a province submitting names which the Government of Canada considers thoroughly objectionable, and says that they just will not do? If you think that is far-fetched, various people have been unpleasant enough to suggest that we might once again have a Péquiste government in Quebec. For that matter, there might be a very eccentric government in various provinces. Sometimes English-speaking people are inclined, I think, to be a little brash in suggesting that odd governments turn up only in Quebec. That suggestion will not hold water and will not withstand examination.

Suppose, for example, you get a freak government in a province—and we have had some very queer governments in provinces in my time—suggesting candidates who are thoroughly unacceptable. What happens then? Does the federal government go back and say: "Try again." If so, how long does this go on? Is there any means of getting over a deadlock if the province in question simply says: "That is our list. If you do not like it, you can go to Jericho or even further." If the federal government then says: "We will not accept anyone on that list," what happens then?

I now come to the spending power. For any future shared-cost programs in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, provinces can choose, as at present, not to participate. At present, if they choose not to participate, they get nothing from the federal treasury. If they choose to participate, they get money from the federal treasury or equivalent tax points, but only if they conform to certain standards set by act of the Parliament of Canada. Under the new section, if they choose not to participate in a program "established by the Government of Canada"—and not the Parliament, as in the section on immigration and aliens—they get "reasonable compensation" if they carry on a "program or initiative that is compatible with the national objectives."

What is meant by "initiative"? What is meant by "compatible"? What is meant by "the national objectives"? Who sets the "national objectives"? It looks as if it were "the Government of Canada". If so, "compatible with the national objectives" is not the same thing as "conforming to standards set out in an Act of Parliament." It could be merely a statement by the Prime Minister or by a minister. The provincial "program" or "initiative" might be a far cry from what Parliament was prepared to pay out money in aid of; but the courts might rule that the provincial program or initiative was eligible for what the courts considered "reasonable compensation" if the program or initiative did not actually fly in the face of what the Prime Minister or the federal government had said, or even of what Parliament had put in an act. If, for example, the federal government announced a national day-care program, in rhetorical flourishes, the courts might rule that a provincial handful of pilot projects was "compatible with the national objectives." On the other hand, there might be a provincial program that was not universally available, or that involved extra-billing, and the courts might say, "Well, it's day-care, and it doesn't contradict what the Prime Minister said," and Parliament would have to pony up. Parliament would again be subordinated to the courts, and provinces might be able to raid the federal treasury for support of mere tokenism.

I have a sixth point respecting compensation for opting out of amendments which would reduce provincial powers, rights or privileges and transfer a provincial power to the Parliament of Canada. At present such a transfer involves "reasonable compensation" from the federal treasury only if it relates to "education or other cultural matters." Of course, again, this might mean the courts ordering Parliament to pay what the courts considered "reasonable."

However, if it is to be done for education and other cultural matters, why not for any transfer? If one province shifts power, and the expenditure involved in the exercise of that power, to Parliament and so saves money, why should another province, which hangs on to the power and must make the expenditure the power involves, not get compensation for what it still has to spend? The courts could not play fast and loose with the amount, because they would simply have to look at the actual amount the opting-out province was spending.

There does not seem to me to be any solid reason for not extending the principle from education and culture to all the transfers for powers. The practical importance of this provision is likely to be very small, as very few amendments transferring powers from the provinces to Parliament are likely to get adopted under the seven-province formula. Some of the smaller and poorer provinces might like to get rid of costly powers. However, even if, let us say, the four Atlantic provinces wanted to do it, they would be three short of the necessary seven. Even if they got one or two other have-not provinces to join them, they would still be short. Neither Ontario nor Quebec is at all likely to want to give up any power whatsoever. Therefore, I am inclined not to share the objections which a good many people raised to that particular provision in the accord.

With respect to changes in the amending formulas, the whole of section 42 of the Constitution Act, 1982, which puts certain amendments under the seven-province formula, disappears, and the matters concerned are brought under the unanimity rule. The chief effect of this is to give every province an absolute veto over any proposals for Senate reform which involve constitutional amendments, and over the extension of existing provinces into the territories and the creation of new provinces. The seven-province formula, for all practical purposes, already rules out any Senate reform proposals which would require constitutional amendments. The absolute veto for any province probably makes no real difference, since it is symbolic rather than practical.

In my opinion, no one is likely to object much to making it harder for the existing provinces to spread into the territories. I may be wrong on that, but it seems to me pretty unlikely. The Constitution Act, 1982 had already made it much harder for the territories to attain provincial status. Giving every province a veto seems to me to be adding an extra obstacle for which it is not easy to find solid reason. Surely Quebec cannot have considered this a necessary condition for signing the accord. What other province can have insisted on it? Why should the federal government have insisted on it? It seems just a gratuitous buffet in the face for the Yukon and the Northwest Territories, and delivered by a body in which they were not represented and which, as far as I know, gave them no chance to be heard.

I have a further point. Putting the First Ministers' conferences into the Constitution does not seem to me to be of much practical importance, although I have had some second thoughts about that which I will come to in a moment. These conferences exist now; they meet annually; they discuss constitutional questions, including possible amendments. They are not going to disappear. They are given no new powers. I am no more enamoured of them than Sir John A. Macdonald was in 1887. In constitutional matters I have always been, through all the changes and chances of my rather chequered career, a John A. Macdonald Conservative. That is why I sat in the Senate as a Pierre Elliot Trudeau Liberal. Therefore, I am not very enthusiastic about putting the First Ministers' conferences into the Constitution. However, I am not sure that it would make a great deal of practical difference. I am not sure that giving them an extra cachet now, after they have become so firmly entrenched in practice, is going to make any real difference. Including in their agenda forever Senate reform and fisheries merely ensures that Mr. Getty and his supporters, and Mr. Peckford and his, and their respective successors, have a guaranteed annual opportunity to talk about these subjects, and, of course, to try to persuade their fellow premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada to agree unanimously to some Senate reform amendment or amendments, and to persuade the Prime Minister and the premiers of the necessary six other provinces to make changes in the jurisdiction over fisheries. But they could do this anyhow, day in and day out, Constitution or no Constitution, First Ministers' conferences or no First Ministers' conferences. I will come back to my second thoughts on this point in a moment.

● (1300)

A further point I would like to make is that it is regrettable that the list of things that are to be on the agenda of the First Ministers' conferences does not include the whole question of aboriginal rights. It might have had only symbolic importance, but for the native peoples that might have been considerable. I am not inclined to think that the First Ministers can be blamed for not putting in something substantive on the aboriginal peoples, because, after all, there have been a number of very strenuous attempts to do this in First Ministers' conferences, one very recent, and they have failed. It would have been extraordinarily difficult to get anything fresh on this subject into the accord. However, there might have been something included with Senate reform and fisheries, giving the aboriginal peoples the assurance that these things would come up seriously, regularly and inevitably in future First Ministers' conferences.

I would like to say something very general, and with this I conclude. I have been an extraordinarily long time, almost like Charles II, who said of himself that he was an unconscionable time a-dying. Well, I have been an unconscionable time drying up.

I would like to suggest that two or three general considerations might enter into your future deliberations on this subject. It seems to me highly probable that what we have in this accord may, in the first place, transfer appreciable powers from Parliament to the provincial legislatures. Is that what we want? Is that what will be good for the country? In the second place, it seems to me quite possible that the accord will mean a considerable shift of power from Parliament and the legislatures, on the one hand, to the courts, on the other hand. Again, is that what we want? The Constitution Act of 1982 has already produced a massive shift of power from Parliament and the legislatures to the courts. In the third place, it seems to me quite possible that the provisions on the Senate may produce a considerable shift of power in the long run—not immediately— from the House of Commons to the Senate. As a former senator, I do not quake from base to apex at that thought, but it is possible that there are a lot of people in the country who would be dubious about this, shall I say, the more outré democrats? I think the point deserves some consideration.

Does the country really want or need a shift of power from the House of Commons to the Senate? I wonder whether anybody in the House of Commons will take a look at this in the joint committee.

There are a number of other points I might have made, and I will just mention one. There is the fact that in section 16 of the accord there are a number of items that are not to be prejudiced by anything in the accord. However, there are other things that are not mentioned, and there are people who are uneasy about the features of the Charter that are not mentioned in section 16, who are afraid that you might find the minority language clause and mobility clause and various other clauses in the Charter affected by, let us say, the "distinct society" provisions.

I do not know how well-founded those qualms are, but they are matters which some people are very much interested in and which ought to be cleared up. The feminists are also afraid that the guaranteed rights for both sexes under the Charter may be prejudiced by the omission of any mention of them in section 16.

On that point, which I suppose might be described as ending on a whimper rather than a bang, I conclude my much-too-long and, I fear, rather discursive preliminary general statement.

The Chairman: Thank you, Dr. Forsey. Honourable senators, do you wish to proceed with questions at this time?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, first, could we determine whether retired Senator Forsey will be available, let us say, on Monday, to continue? He has given us quite a banquet for weekend digestion. We may have some questions to raise with him on Monday.

If he would be available Monday, then my proposal to the committee is for us to adjourn now until 2 p.m., because we have a few things to deal with on the order paper. I propose that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again next week. I propose that we continue with Dr. Forsey then. However, we should determine whether he would be available and whether that would suit his plans.

The Chairman: Is that suitable to you, Dr. Forsey?

[Translation]

Dr. Forsey: Honourable senators, I shall be at your disposal at any time, except in the middle of the night.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, in view of such kindness, there will be no problem.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I therefore move that the committee adjourn, report progress and that it ask for leave to sit again.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting will now resume.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which the Meech Lake accord and texts subsequently agreed to were referred, reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I move that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

At 2.00 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

PATENT EXTENSION (ASPARTAME) BILL

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. Ian Sinclair, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, presented the following report:

Friday, June 26, 1987

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

SIXTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-259, An Act to extend the term of a patent relating to a certain food additive, has in obedience to the Order of Reference of Thursday, 25th June, 1987, examined the said Bill and has agreed to report the same with the following amendment:

Page 1, clause 2: Strike out lines 8 to 10 and substitute the following:

"of Canadian Patent No. 846,137 is extended to December 31, 1987."

Respectfully submitted,

IAN SINCLAIR
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Sinclair: With leave, I move its adoption now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

[Senator Molgat.]

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, Bill C-259, which was considered by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee pursuant to the order of reference of the Senate, is a most unusual piece of legislation. It deals with a private right, yet, it is not a private bill. It is a private bill of a type—it is a private-public bill which apparently resulted in people of contrary interests not having knowledge of its consideration. Accordingly, when the committee examined it, we were told first that instructions with regard to the bill were given to the sponsor by the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and the minister, the Honourable Harvie Andre.

Following that, consultations took place between the sponsor and the owner of the company making NutraSweet—namely, Monsanto Chemical Company—and members of the NutraSweet organization. The sponsor of the bill was very forthright in stating to us that people of contrary interests should be given an opportunity to present their views concerning this unusual extension of a patent, because such an extension normally does not occur. Because there were people both in Canada and outside Canada who wished to be heard, because of the numbers that were involved, and because the patent would have expired on July 7 next unless extended by means of legislation, the committee decided to recommend to honourable senators that an extension of the patent be granted until the end of the year. The committee suggests that the bill be passed, as amended.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill, as amended, be read the third time?

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, on a question of procedure, should not someone move an amendment to the bill, or is it taken for granted that the bill is automatically amended through the committee report?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Did we not adopt the report of the committee?

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the report was presented and recommended the passage of the bill as amended.

Senator Frith: I believe our procedure is correct, but I think it is a good idea to get this straight. I believe that if a committee reports a bill with an amendment, and if that report is adopted, we have then adopted the principle of the bill; we have adopted an amended bill. Therefore we go to third reading right away. I think that is the correct procedure. The bill is then put, as amended. It is the report that has amended the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill, as amended, read third time and passed.

CANADA-EUROPE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

VISIT OF DELEGATION TO FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY—
DEBATE CONTINUED

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Leblanc (Saurel) calling the attention of the Senate to the visit of the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association delegation to the Federal Republic of Germany, from January 15 to 27, 1987.—(Honourable Senator Leblanc (Saurel)).

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, the parliamentary delegation that visited the Federal Republic of Germany from January 15 to 27, 1987, to study the German federal election process, was led by Mr. Jack Ellis, M.P. for the riding of Prince Edward-Hastings and Chairman of the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association.

Mr. Ellis deserves to be congratulated by the entire delegation for his competence and dedication. Personally, I would also like to congratulate the Executive Secretary, Mrs. Danielle Parent-Bélisle and her assistant, Ms. Carol Chafe, who not only helped to organize the delegation but also accompanied delegates during their trip to Lahr, Bonn, Munich, Berlin and Heidelberg.

The Canadian delegates included three senators: the Honourable Jeremiah Grafstein, the Honourable Norman Atkins and myself, as vice-chairman of the Canada-Germany Friendship Group. In addition to the six Conservative members of the House of Commons who were part of the delegation, we also had one Liberal member, Mrs. Thérèse Killens, M.P. for St-Michel-Ahuntsic and Mr. Ernie Epp of the New Democratic Party, M.P. for Thunder Bay-Nipigon.

The visit was organized to allow Canadian parliamentarians the opportunity to study Germany's political system, in particular the organization and running of the election campaign, the issues being debated and the role of the political foundation of each party.

I don't think it would be useful to expand further on a report that has already been released to all senators. However, I would like to take this opportunity to express my thanks to all Canadians and Germans who co-operated in whatever way with the Canadian delegation, to help members learn as much as possible about this very important subject, the Federal Republic of Germany's electoral system.

I would like to take this opportunity to ask the two other senators who accompanied the delegation to give us their comments, if they wish to do so.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should have informed the Senate that if Senator Leblanc spoke, his speech would have the effect of closing the debate on this inquiry. Unless the Senate should wish to decide otherwise, the debate on this inquiry is now closed.

Senator Leblanc (Saurel): Mr. Speaker, when I mentioned the fact that I was going to table a notice of inquiry to the two senators who accompanied the Canadian delegation to Germany, they both indicated they would be interested in speaking as well. I wonder whether we could make an exception to our rules and keep this item on the order paper, so they can decide whether they want to participate or not.

The Hon. the Speaker: Are honourable senators agreed to ignore the rules?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Agreed. Perhaps Senator Leblanc (Saurel) would like to adjourn the debate in his name?

Senator Leblanc (Saurel): Agreed, Mr. Speaker.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Leblanc (Saurel) moves that the debate be continued at the next sitting of the Senate. Is it your pleasure to adopt the motion, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Leblanc (Saurel), debate adjourned.

THE ESTIMATES, 1987-88

INTERIM REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the Twelfth Report of the Senate Standing Committee on National Finance (Second Interim Report on 1987-88 Main Estimates), presented in the Senate on 23rd June, 1987.—(Honourable Senator Leblanc (Saurel)).

Hon. Fernand E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I seem to be taxing the patience of senators today. Of course it is sheer coincidence that both orders are consecutive.

This twelfth report of the National Finance Committee represents our second interim report on the 1987-88 Main Estimates. Through these two reports, the purpose is to advise the Senate about the National Finance Committee progress concerning the government response to the recommendations tabled during the 33rd Parliament. The first report dealt with tax expenditures and accounts receivable. This one deals with the form and use of supplementary estimates as well as the Financial Administration Act. Both fields fall under Treasury Board jurisdiction.

With respect to the form and use of supplementary estimates we asked Treasury Board officials what was their reaction to our recommendations on: first, the ambiguous use of the one dollar vote to transfer money from one vote to another; second, the imprecise use of Treasury Board Vote 5 to cope with urgent expenditures and, finally, the inconsistencies between the descriptions of certain programs in Estimates Part III and references to these programs in the supplementary estimates.

As to the Financial Administration Act, we wanted to know the reaction of Treasury Board to our recommendation that the law be amended to ensure coherence between debt write-off and forgiveness.

On all points Treasury Board admitted that the committee recommendations were relevant and declared that the necessary corrections had been or were being made. Treasury Board also agreed to consult the committee and seek our advice on alternate solutions which would allay some of our concerns.

I am pleased to report this to the Senate today because it goes to show that certain departments follow the advice flowing from the excellent work done by Senate committees.

At this point I should like to quote a letter dated June 18, 1987 sent by the Auditor General to me as Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance. It reads:

Dear sir, in its Eleventh Report dated May 28, 1987, the Senate Standing Committee on National Finance recommended that I serve notice—

These are the words of the Auditor General—

—to Government departments that the memorandum accounts for the receivables which appear in Volume II of the Public Accounts are to be audited. I can inform you that for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1987, I asked my departmental audit teams to examine all these memorandum accounts, with the exception of those held by the Department of National Revenue for income tax and customs duty. The latter accounts will be audited in a year or so.

We will have a thorough discussion with the Comptroller General's Office about the results of our exercise in the departments, in order to improve their procedures, if necessary, so that their receivables can in future be entered into the audited statements of the Government of Canada.

The support given by your committee to the inclusion of these accounts receivable in the financial statements of the government constitutes a major step towards the improvement of federal financial reporting and the acceptance of accounting standards for the federal and provincial governments, which standards have been set by the Canadian accounting profession as a whole.

Sincerely yours,

Kenneth M. Dye, F.C.A.

Copy of this letter was sent to Mr. Michael H. Rayner, Comptroller General of Canada, and to Mr. J. A. MacDonald, Chairman of the Committee of the Accounting and Auditing of Public Sector Organizations.

I know that the Senate does its best to ensure that the government pays attention to its own recommendations. Instead of waiting for the Senate and the government to agree on a universal solution, the Committee on National Finance has, on its own initiative, asked various departments to give their reaction to its recommendations. Until now, we are satisfied with the response we have obtained from the Treasury Board, to name but one, and we shall continue our survey of other departments when we resume our work next fall.

[Senator Leblanc.]

Mr. Speaker, if no one else wants to take part in this debate, I believe that it can be concluded at this time, and I shall ask that the report be adopted.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE—MOTION TO TELEVISION PROCEEDINGS—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rousseau:

That pool television cameras be permitted in the Senate Chamber for the purpose of recording the proceedings of a Committee of the Whole with respect to its hearings on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to; and

That the proceedings be televised pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons.—(Honourable Senator Flynn, P.C.)

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, yesterday we stood this order. I believe Senator Frith said a word about the possibility of allowing the television team—or however you may want to describe the group—to experiment during the next meeting of the Committee of the Whole.

● (1420)

Honourable senators, I have no problem with that as long as the decision on the substance and the principle involved is delayed.

Perhaps the question should be put to senators as to whether they have any objection to an experiment being conducted by the television people during the next sitting of the Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake accord.

If that meets with the approval of honourable senators, then I would like to adjourn the debate on the motion.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, Senator Flynn has just asked us to give approval to an experiment. The question is: What is the experiment? Senator Frith and Senator Flynn have obviously been involved in negotiations, so surely the rest of us are entitled to know what took place during those negotiations.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, I think that a portion of the resolution, which we are ostensibly discussing this afternoon, requires a little amplification.

In the substantive part of the resolution about televising in the Senate the last paragraph reads:

That the proceedings be televised pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons.

It is to that particular portion of the resolution that I would like to direct some attention, because I wonder just how we can give effect to that principle.

If one studies the rules that were originally laid down in the House of Commons with respect to television, one will see that there are a couple which may cause some trouble. One is the transmission, in full colour, in French and English, of broadcast quality. Perhaps that is not insuperable, but the important one, a rule which goes to the very heart of an electronic Hansard—which is what they have in the other place—is that the proceedings be fed out to networks and other users without editing, alteration or revision of any kind by the House of Commons. I am not exactly sure how to interpret that phrase, but at first glance it seems to me that what they intend by that is that the televised proceedings of the other place should be fed into the networks without any editing or amending by anyone—just as nature gave it.

That certainly will not be our experience, because I do not believe that the televised proceedings of this house are being fed into a network anywhere. If I am incorrect on that point, I am sure that I will be informed about it.

What will happen, I suspect, is that instead of an electronic Hansard in which the proceedings are disseminated, warts and all, on the television network, we will have the proceedings recorded in some way or other. Then the networks, because they are not broadcasting the whole proceedings, will excerpt and make selections as to what part of the proceedings they wish to put on the air.

In effect, we should expect that we are going to get the same kind of 90-second treatment, you might say, that you would get if you were appearing on the television camera outside this chamber when the networks, in the first instance, decide what portion of the proceedings will get air time.

I am not entirely sure that I have this correct, and I raise it because it is a matter of concern. If my interpretation is correct, then I suspect that this statement about adhering to the principles and practices of the House of Commons is not entirely accurate, because we may not be able to do it. I think there should be some clarification on this point. If we are not going to follow the proceedings of the House of Commons and the principles and practices that govern their transmissions, then perhaps we should give some thought to changing the wording of this resolution so that it reflects reality.

That is a point that perhaps the sponsor of the resolution could comment on and let us know just in what way he anticipates that the televised proceedings of this house will be disseminated to the general public.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Roblin is substantially correct in his understanding. At the moment, honourable senators, I am responding to a point of clarification, and I am not attempting to close the debate because, in fact, we have before us a motion for adjournment which I also may want to comment on.

It is quite correct that the motion is asking for television access, that is, that the networks have access to a television feed. It is not an electronic Hansard that we are speaking about. Therefore, Senator Roblin is correct in that it will not just be feeding out the entire proceedings with or without editing by the house.

He is also correct when he says that we should understand—and if we require to change the wording, we should do so—that the rules of the House of Commons that we are going to apply will be applied “where applicable,” because the motion is asking for something different from an electronic Hansard. Therefore, all of the rules that were established in the other place that apply to an electronic Hansard cannot apply to our situation. We are dealing with something less. Therefore, it is a matter of having them apply where applicable, such as no panning, and takes only of the persons asking or answering questions.

That is why I toyed with the idea of having an experiment to see how it would work. However, if that is unsatisfactory, as I gather it is from what Senator Phillips has said, then I will, of course, agree to the adjournment of the debate, since Senator Flynn has not had a full opportunity to speak to the matter. Then, on Monday we will be asking for a vote on the motion, because if the experiment idea will not fly, then we will have to move to the actual motion itself.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, I should like to ask a further question. The point of my intervention was to say that the reference to the principles and practices of the House of Commons would bind us to something that we are obviously not prepared to do. It means, therefore, that this motion ought to be amended in the course of this debate, and before we are called upon to vote on it. My question is whether that will be arranged.

Senator Frith: That is why I think we should add the words “where applicable”. I believe the addition of those words would meet the concern of Senator Roblin, which I think is a legitimate one. I believe it is clear that we are not asking for an electronic Hansard, so we should say that we are going to apply the rules that were established in the House of Commons, where applicable. We have already conducted an experiment with committees operating in that way, but we have not done it in the chamber, and that is what I am asking for. I am asking that we televise the proceedings of the Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake accord.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, in his remarks Senator Frith referred to my opposition. I did not express any opposition to the principle, because, right now, no one except Senator Frith seems to understand what he has in mind.

I would like to get some clarification from Senator Frith as to how many cameras will be involved and where they will be located. Will they be located outside the bar, in the gallery, or will they be located on the floor of the Senate? Surely that is important information which we should have before we decide on the experiment.

Senator Roblin has referred to editing. Are we going to have someone in charge of editing, as they have in the House of Commons? If it is going to be a news item, then I understand there has to be some editing. Where would be the control booth? Where would the individual in charge be placed? That leads us to the question of who is in charge. Is it the Speaker, the Clerk, the Clerk Assistant, Mr. Lovelace, or the chairman of the Rules and Orders Committee? Experiments without knowing what one is doing can be very dangerous.

● (1430)

Senator Frith: If you know what you are doing, you do not need an experiment. The reason for the experiment is to find out.

Senator Phillips: A lot of people know what they are doing when they are experimenting. They have done investigations beforehand.

I have one further question for the honourable senator. Usually when the cameras are located on the floor of the Senate for the opening of Parliament there are at least four seats removed from the floor of the Senate. Are we going to remove the seats of honourable senators for the experiment? I wish he would give us some information so that we will have an idea of what we are discussing. We are discussing an experiment which has been discussed between himself and someone else, and we have no idea as to what that discussion was.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, let us get this straight: I am not going to be able to answer all of the questions. It is a new experience. It will be like the experience that we had during the opening of Parliament. It will not be the same. It will not be exactly the same as the House of Commons. I do not know the answers to all questions. The only answer I know is what I have already said, which is that I understand there will be up to three cameras. I believe that two of them will be placed, one on each side of the chamber, so that they can take pictures of the person speaking.

I really do not know all the answers. I guarantee that if we are to have an absolutely complete understanding, down to the last detail, of every rule—so that we can be sitting here with a whole set of rules, watching the camera and television people, and then say, “Oh, oh, you have just contravened paragraph 6(2)(a)” —it will not happen that way.

If, in fact, any honourable senator needs a complete understanding of everything that will take place, with a corresponding list of guarantees, then he or she must vote against the motion, because I will not be able to provide that. This interim suggestion, which I first discussed with Senator Flynn, was to give us an idea so that when we come to the main motion we could say, “Yes, it was okay, but I did not like that part, but this part was okay.”

That is the way they have had to work it out, virtually with a Bible, on the other side. The way it now operates is that if someone has a complaint, they meet and say, “Look, that will not do, you have to change it,” and they do.

I have tabled some documents saying that is so; but I guess that if the experiment idea is not accepted, then I will be asking for a vote on Monday on the main motion. I thought the experiment would give us an opportunity to see how it works—and, in some cases, give opponents of the idea some ammunition if it did not work. But it seems that even on the basis of an experiment some honourable senators want a much more complete list of answers to questions than it is possible for me to give.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that, in effect, we had part of a dry run recently in the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources when we held hearings on the proposed takeover of Dome Petroleum. In my humble opinion, that was a complete disaster. We had about seven cameras in the room. Some chairs were moved, the cameras were placed against the table, and those of us who were sitting above the cameras could not see the witness, and those who were sitting below the cameras could not see the chairman. The heat in the room was absolutely insufferable, and it was really an unfortunate experience.

Senator Frith: Were you present at the hearings by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee?

Senator Doody: I was fortunate enough to get a seat. I got there early.

Senator Frith: But were you at the Banking, Trade and Commerce experiment, under Senator Murray?

Senator Doody: Yes. That also was a very full house. All of the chairs around the table were occupied, but the cameras were more discreetly placed in that hearing.

I am saying that we have had some experiments and some experiences, and I would have thought there would be some merit in trying to compare the advantages or disadvantages of some of the experiments which we have already tried and applying them to a set of general rules to govern the experiment which we are now considering.

It seems to me from the way we are going that it will be a wide open experiment, with no guidelines, and it might very well prejudice some of us against a more general use of cameras in this place.

My words are simply words of caution. I would like honourable senators to have a more concrete view of exactly what is in mind before the experiment starts.

Senator Roblin: Honourable senators, may I ask a question combined with a suggestion? We are not likely to be under great pressure to have television installed in the chamber on Monday or Tuesday, unless I misunderstand the situation. There may be some merit in attempting, during the time following the adjournment, to work out a plan of operation, recognizing that it will not cover everything and that it will be subject to amendment as experience indicates. I believe it would be helpful to the house if we had a more detailed operating plan to deal with whatever of the observations made on the matter can practically be attacked. I know that in the other place they had a special committee of the House of Commons which met long and often—as no doubt the Leader of the Opposition will confirm—in order to try to get a plan of action to which the House would agree. That plan was eventually submitted to the House and approved.

I am not saying that we have to follow that procedure. But is there not a possibility that during the recess we could tackle this matter in a more systematic way and try to produce a scenario—that is probably an appropriate word—as to how this matter would be expected to work in the house? It would give us an opportunity to look that over before we are asked to vote on a resolution which really is very sweeping.

Senator Frith: I believe there is some common ground. I suspect that Senator Roblin is right, that we may not have an application or request on Monday for the use of the facilities. But I would like to have the motion dealt with, and then perhaps we can do exactly what Senator Roblin says, and during the vacation try to work out something more satisfactory in terms of detail.

It may very well be that we will, in fact, pass this motion and we will never see a television camera in here, because they may never want to come here to cover it. As I say, this is not an electronic Hansard. It will not automatically happen when we pass the motion.

Senator Roblin: Who will pay for it?

Senator Frith: On this basis there is no cost, except the cost of electricity for the lighting. With electronic Hansard it is quite a different story.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I am not seeking to make any comment upon the exchange on this particular item; but on the general question of television, I was attracted to a notice, which we received prior to the Governor General reading the Speech from the Throne in this chamber, that television would be the order of the day. Rather than raise the matter at that time, and possibly find that no authority existed, I did nothing; but I am curious to know by what authority the Speech from the Throne is televised in the Senate chamber. It is my understanding that no authority exists. It is a matter that I leave floating in the atmosphere—

Senator Frith: In colour.

Senator MacEachen:—so that if it descends at some future time, no one will be surprised.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, may I repeat one of the several questions that I directed to Senator Frith? I did not expect a detailed answer to them all, but surely in his discussions he must have considered the fact that several senators might have their seats displaced. That is a question of privilege for those senators involved. Could you give us some further information on how he dealt with that matter?

• (1440)

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, Senator Molgat has been dealing with this question more recently than I have in that he has been discussing it with people on the other side. He might be able to answer the question better than I, although he told me the last time we spoke on the matter that two senators' chairs would have to be removed.

An Hon. Senator: Not mine!

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, it is well known in certain circles that I am rather lukewarm to the introduction of television into the Senate. However, I am a good party player, and I tend to be guided by the collective wisdom of consensus when consensus is there. Having said that, I would like to express some reservations about having scaffolding, TV cameras, technician crews and cables on the floor of this assembly.

Parliament Hill has become a national carnival. All you have to do is peep out your window, look to the east, and you will see a glorious tent with rock music coming from it and with Coke vending machines—or Pepsi, if that is your choice. Of course, for the Canada Day celebrations we have a big canopy over the front steps. The other day we had a kite-flying team from Holland spreading out their wares on the front lawn. The place is becoming rather ridiculous. You would think that this was the national playground, or something like that.

An Hon. Senator: Isn't it?

Senator Frith: After all, they own the place!

Senator Corbin: I suppose it is in the minds of some people. However, before I entered politics, I looked upon Parliament as a dignified institution, indeed, an institution which ought to be treated with a great deal of dignity, whether it be my party or another party in power, or whether or not there are one or two kooks on the floor of the house spreading their brains for everyone to examine.

The fact is that this is where the heart of the nation throbs. There is no way that the justices of the Supreme Court would allow bazaars to take place on their front lawn. We have allowed this whole decadent atmosphere to go a little too far for my taste. I am just a junior boy around here, as Senator Walker will sometimes say, but I have seen what has happened in the House of Commons with the coming of television. In my view the task of journalists has been made much easier, but I do not think it has contributed that much to the quality of debate on the floor of the House. Every MP has suddenly become a star, or thinks he or she is a star. No longer are questions directed in an attempt to resolve the serious problems at hand. Questions are thrown into the lenses of the cameras to get the reactions of the voting public. MPs have forgotten about the very essence of the institution of Parliament. Rather than talking intelligently to each other and debating serious matters they jostle for positions in the electoral mind of the people. In my opinion, legislation, as a consequence, suffers greatly. It seems that the trend now is to be guided by a daily referendum, and every morning to sift through the collection of newspaper clippings we get to see what was decided by the referendum according to what was seen on the national news the previous evening.

Now we want to put cameras on the floor of the Senate. So be it, if that is what the majority wants. If that is what the leadership of my party wants, I shall just keep quiet, shut up, and perhaps not vote on the matter. But for goodness sake, is there a need to have all that apparatus on the very floor of the Senate? Up here to my left is a whole gallery which is reserved for members of the press.

Senator Marshall: It is never used.

Senator Corbin: Yes, it is hardly ever used, except when we decide that we will not go along with the wishes of the honourable members on the other side of the building. Then we have four or five journalists trickling in here and almost pleading for us to get on with the decision we are supposed to take on the particular matter so that they can get the heck out of here in a hurry and go back to wherever it is they hang out. So, I am not at all supportive of this idea of having television crews and apparatus on the floor of the Senate. There is enough empty space at the edges of this very large and, for that matter, very beautiful room, and it seems to me that that is where we ought to put those camera crews. Mind you, being a backbencher in this place I will not be on the screen every 15 minutes. I am a very modest and humble person, and I am not a constitutional expert. So, I have nothing to gain, though that is certainly not the reason I am against this whole set-up.

In other words, what I am asking—and I do not expect anyone to respond today—is that we ensure that the integrity of the Senate, in terms of the dignity of the house, is fully preserved and maintained, and if camera crews are introduced that they be located in an area where they will not disrupt the movement of honourable senators on the floor of the house, whether it is in the back row, the middle row, the front row, or along the edges. Technically, I cannot understand why they cannot be located somewhere up there.

When we dealt with the patriation of the Constitution in 1982, in room 200 of the West Block, we worked and sweated under the lights and under the camera crews. It was no fun, but that was the wish of Parliament in that day and age, involving a rather substantial debate. I do not want to belittle the exercise. The signature of Quebec on the constitutional accord is in itself an important event, and there is no doubt about it. However, it is not an event equal in importance to the one we had in 1982, although it does tie the knot neatly. I do not think there is the same justification for all this glamour, these lights, these cameras, and the rebroadcasting. I feel that we could do a much better job if we did it in the quiet and serenity of our everyday operations, without somebody breathing down our necks, catching sight of the back of our heads, or whatever. I cannot understand people who feel that to get the message across one absolutely has to be on television.

This is a house of revision. There is not the same need for broadcasting our deliberations here as there is in the other place, in the elected chamber. These are some thoughts that I wanted to put on record, because it is well known on the other side of the house that in the past I have not played ball all the way.

I am more concerned with the inner workings and the serious workings of the institution rather than the passing glory of an image on an electronic screen. I do not think it will change much in the long run, but unless you tell me that the television crews are to be located elsewhere than on the floor of the Senate, I may well vote against the proposition.

• (1450)

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that the proposal is related to the Meech Lake study, and although the steering committee had not asked me to do this, I thought that as chairman I should at least find out what it might mean if, in fact, the decision were made by the Senate to conduct the study. Therefore, I did inquire, and I believe I can give you some useful information as to what it would mean.

I was particularly concerned because of the experience that we had had in the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders regarding tape recording, as honourable senators will recall. What did happen at one of our committee meetings was that a tape recorder was brought in without authorization, and the person moved around with the tape recorder and recorded on tape conversations which were, in fact, the private conversations of senators. The committee studied this matter carefully and recommended to the Senate a set of proposals which the Senate accepted. Therefore, I was concerned about what this would mean to the functioning of the committee.

Honourable senators, this is what I have been told by those who would be involved in establishing it. First, there would be a maximum of four cameras. In other words, there would be no more than four television cameras, and possibly only three. Second, that they would be in a fixed position on tripod. There would be no movement of cameramen about the room. They would stay in one position. In order to achieve proper coverage, there would have to be one camera on either side. That would mean the removal of one chair on either side, probably that of the Honourable Senator Rossiter and that of the Honourable Senator Rousseau. Those senators would temporarily have to be seated in another location.

An Hon. Senator: Two women!

Senator Molgat: In case the ladies see this as a sexist approach, it just so happens that their two locations are the ones that give best coverage to the chamber from a technical standpoint. Those would be the only two chairs that would be moved.

The other two cameras—if there are to be two—would presumably be at the back of the chamber. As I say, there would be no movement; the cameras would be stationary. On the days when there was to be television, the cameramen would come in and stay in position. They would not be moving in and out during the course of the discussion here. Of course, there would have to be lighting during that period.

There is one problem that we are already aware of and that has been previously discussed, and that is the location of witnesses. That matter came up this morning again, and it is something that the Senate should consider; whether, when the Senate sits in Committee of the Whole, the present location is the appropriate location for the witness. As you saw this morning when Senator Forsey was with us, inevitably half of the Senate is behind the witness, which is not an ideal situation even if we do not have television coverage. Therefore, if we proceed with television coverage, it might mean a change, possibly a table here at the front beside the Speaker's Chair or possibly in front of Black Rod's table at the back so that all of the Senate would be in a better position to face the witness. The chairman of the committee would be the one who would have difficulty if the witness were located here at the front beside the Speaker's Chair.

There is one thing to keep in mind, although the two items do not necessarily go hand in hand, but I am told that if we do proceed to television coverage, we would probably have a request for still-picture coverage. Apparently in the House of Commons this is what happened. When they moved into television, there was immediately a request by still photographers. In the House of Commons this element can easily be accommodated because of the lobbies and the curtains. Here in the Senate the situation would not be the same. In any case, that would be a decision that the Senate would make if it wanted to take that second step. However, if it had to be done, it would mean probably a photographer in each corner, or possibly upstairs in the gallery. Again, they would not be moving about and there would be no interference. That is a separate decision, but I thought I should at least warn the Senate that that request might be made so that if it does come at a later date, it will not be a surprise.

Honourable senators, that, I think, is basically the information that I can give you as to how it would function. If you have any further questions, I would be happy to answer them, if I can.

Hon. Jean Le Moynes: Would senators need union cards from the Actors' Guild? Secondly, I hope that the whips will be very busy, because the cameramen will have fun photographing the empty spaces in this chamber.

Senator Roblin: There is something that my friend has not mentioned, and I ask him about it now: What use would be made of these pictures?

Senator Molgat: The decision as to when the camera would be here, and for which witnesses, would be that of the pool, as they call it. The use of material would also be a decision of the pool. As has been stated here, this is not electronic media; this is access to our debates by a television camera, so the people who take the pictures decide what to do with them.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a question for Senator Molgat. I think he was vaguely simplistic in saying that only one seat on each side would be moved. I find it difficult to imagine a tripod supporting a camera and a cameraman and yet occupying no more space than either Senator Rossiter or Senator Rousseau. I think it will take up a great deal more space, and it will certainly block the aisle.

The next question I have concerns the removal of the cameras. This morning the Senate was in Committee of the Whole for a period and now we are into a regular sitting. How long does it take to put the cameras in place and how long does it take to remove them, or do you intend them to stay, even though the proceedings are not being televised?

Senator Molgat: On the second part of your question, senator, I am sorry I cannot give you a precise answer as to how long it would take to remove the equipment.

Insofar as the amount of space taken is concerned, I had the same doubts that you did, Senator Phillips, and I asked for confirmation that this would indeed mean the removal of only one chair. I was told that, yes, definitely, it only means a small platform on which the tripod can sit so as to be sufficiently high to give proper coverage. I was assured that it would not mean the removal of the desks but simply one chair. That is the answer I was given.

Senator Phillips: The honourable senator has not answered the second part of my question. Will the cameras stay in the chamber between the sittings of the Committee of the Whole? For instance, if we are in Committee of the Whole on Monday, will the cameras stay here on the floor of the Senate in case we go back into Committee of the Whole on Tuesday?

Senator Molgat: I cannot give you a precise answer to that. My understanding is that if it is a day on which the cameras are to be here, they would be brought in prior to the session and remain here during the whole of the session. However, if it is a day when the Senate does not have a sitting of the Committee of the Whole, I presume the equipment would be removed. I cannot guarantee that, but I think that that is the case.

• (1520)

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, it is not often that I agree with my good friend from New Brunswick, Senator Corbin, in debate, but I must associate myself with his remarks in this particular instance.

I am terribly worried about this process, and very glad there are no cameras in this chamber this afternoon. I do not know if Senator Molgat understood the implication of a couple of things that he said. One of the things he said was that Senator Rousseau's chair and Senator Rossiter's chair would be removed. Shortly after that he said that the television men would be there and there while the senator women would be God knows where. I would like the public to see and hear this, this great men's club. It is really quite disgraceful.

I have been away from the house for the last three days. I have just come back from a seminar on women's issues. Those of you who know me well know I am a mainliner. I do not get uptight about women's issues. However, what I see going on in this chamber is simply disgraceful; it really is. If the cameras must come, put them up in the press gallery. Do not ask Senator Rossiter and Senator Rousseau to move. Where are you going to put them?

Senator Argue: I will volunteer my seat. There are lots of empty seats.

Senator Robertson: There are always lots of empty seats, indeed. Perhaps we should have the cameras so they pan around. Maybe that would be better.

Senator Molgat: I rise on a point of privilege. Is Senator Robertson really serious in suggesting that my comments were addressed to women or to men, or that there was any kind of sexist connotation? It is a pure accident that there happens to be two honourable female senators sitting in those chairs. Certainly my comments were not meant in that way in the least.

By the way, there are other vacant chairs, one directly behind you, Senator Robertson, and one right next to me.

Senator Frith: There are also women cameramen.

Senator Robertson: Honourable senators, as I said when I started my remarks, I am sure the honourable senator did not understand the impact of what he was saying. I accept that your remarks were said without any malice or any bias. However, when it is said like that, what in the world would the people out there think? It is really quite ridiculous.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would like, in all humility and with much regret, to disagree with both of my colleagues from New Brunswick. I am prepared to give my seat to Senator Rossiter or Senator Rousseau and sit on the floor crosslegged. I am sure my honourable friend, Senator Molgat, who is the soul of courtesy, had no intention of offending anyone.

As for our being a circus, if you will allow me my usual piece of pedantry, Socrates thought that writing, a new-fangled means of communication of his day, should be banned, because he said it imprisoned thought. At every new step in the development of means of communication there has been resistance on the grounds that it was somehow going to devalue the intellectual content this new means was to carry. There was similar criticism of the printing press, because it was so much more loving and personalized and careful to sit down and to write with a quill pen for le Duc de Berry, with illuminations in the margins by great artists.

Television is here to stay. We are not going to get rid of it. I do not think that the Senate can dodge this issue. That does not mean, necessarily, that television will be interested in observing us. However, should television be interested in observing us, I promise you I will not speak while television is here, because I am poor on TV. I have enough vanity to want to avoid it, but we cannot retreat collectively from the twentieth century and tell them not to come.

Senator Flynn: I do not have any further contribution to make after this debate.

Senator Sinclair: If we are through with this very interesting subject, I have an intervention. Are we through with it?

Senator Doody: No.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rousseau, that—

Senator Doody: Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, is the motion being put now?

Senator Frith: I can understand why the Speaker is going to put the motion. We were not doing anything, so I do not blame him for it at all.

[Senator Molgat.]

In view of the observations that have been made and the fact that we obviously have some strong feelings on this subject, I suggest that I close the debate on Monday and that we vote on the question then. I will adjourn the debate. If I speak to it on Monday, that will close the debate, and then we can have the vote.

Senator Phillips: Will the honourable senator attempt to have a little more information on Monday than he has today? Because, while I have not completely ruled out the idea of trying TV on a temporary basis, I would like to know a little more about the subject than the honourable senator has been willing or able to give us at this time.

Senator Frith: If the honourable senator will tell me what questions he wants answered, I will try. However, "a little more information" will go on forever. We have already had a lot more information added from Senator Molgat. So if the honourable senator will tell me what questions he wants answered, I will try to answer them. I am not undertaking not to close the debate and ask for disposition of the motion on the basis of whether or not I answer his questions satisfactorily, or give any answers for that matter.

Senator Phillips: I did not ask him to provide a satisfactory answer, but I asked him if he will be able to. Perhaps that was part of the reason for the questioning.

One most important question was left unanswered, and that is: Who is in charge of the television proceedings?

Senator Frith: I can answer that right now. The Senate is.

Senator Phillips: In what way?

Senator Frith: What do you mean by "in charge"? Do you mean who is going to push the buttons?

Senator Phillips: In your introduction you mentioned that we could have the Speaker, we could have the Table, we could have Mr. Lovelace. Is Mr. Lovelace in charge of it; is the Clerk in charge of it; is the Clerk Assistant in charge of it? I am using your own words.

Senator Frith: I am using your words. I never said that Mr. Lovelace or the Chair would be in charge. I said there would have to be somebody delegated to represent the Senate in dealing with the networks. I said it could be any of those.

In the meantime, it seems that the chairman has been talking to them, and it could be the steering committee. However, essentially it will be the Senate that will be in charge in that sense. Will there be a senator out there switching buttons? No, if you mean "in charge" that way. The networks will be running the technical operation. Their permission to be here and what arrangements are made with them and what complaints we have, and so on, will all be in the hands of the Senate.

Senator Roblin: I thought my honourable friend agreed with me that he ought to amend his resolution on this question as appropriate.

Senator Frith: Yes, and I thank Senator Roblin.

Senator Roblin: If that is the case, it might be advisable to have some other person adjourn the debate so that the amendment can be brought in in proper form. My honourable friend is not in a position to do it.

Senator Frith: If we all agree that it should be so amended, let's amend it now, and agree, with consent, that it should be so amended.

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Frith, debate adjourned.

VISIT OF SENATE DELEGATION TO JAPAN

DEBATE CONCLUDED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Charbonneau calling the attention of the Senate to the visit of a Senate delegation to Japan, from April 13 to 19, 1987, in response to an invitation from the Japanese House of Councillors.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I congratulate Senator Charbonneau on the intervention he made at page 1325 of the Debates of the Senate of June 22 last. It was a marvellous trip under his excellent leadership. The account he gave of the trip and the emphasis he placed upon those aspects that were important and upon what was achieved were very well done. I hope he will permit me to speculate that he drew upon the expertise and efforts of Kay Higgins, who accompanied us on the trip and who took careful notes. I congratulate her, and I thank her for her efforts and everything she did to help make the trip a successful one.

There are just two points that I want to expand upon. First, at page 1328 mention was made of a visit to the Keidanren. At that time the question of free trade came up and, along with it, the Liberal Party's attitude towards it. The response I was reported to have given—and I expect that these were my exact words, because I am sure that Miss Higgins got them down correctly—is the following:

... in principle, if the agreement was in the interest of Canada, as could be expected, the Liberal Party—traditionally a free trade party—would not impede it.

I had certainly intended to say "as would be hoped," but I probably did say "as could be expected." I mention that because I do not think even the government supporters feel that we can be certain about any agreement, Canada's interests or not.

Finally, I want to thank the Speaker for the favourable review that he gave my performance on the Koto, but I am bound in honesty to say that the review really overrated the performance.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this inquiry is considered debated.

CHILD CARE

NATIONAL POLICY—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Mira Spivak rose, pursuant to notice of Monday, June 22, 1987:

That she will call the attention of the Senate to the question of a national policy on child care.

She said: Honourable senators, there are several historic national debates taking place at this time in which the Senate will figure prominently—not, however, the most recent debate on television coverage of Senate proceedings. The debate on child care will affect our country as fundamentally, perhaps more so, as any of these debates, such as that on the Constitutional Accord or that on capital punishment. I believe that the Senate should participate in the shaping of the policy on child care, as it will in the others.

It is easy to ascertain the reasons for an increasing emphasis on this area of social policy in recent times. The “traditional” model of the Canadian family—two-parent, one-income, full-time homemaker mother—is now in the minority. Accompanying this trend has been a sharp increase of female participation in the labour force. In 1967, 16.7 per cent of women with children under six were in the labour force; in 1987, this is true of over 56 per cent of women with children under three and over 63 per cent of women with children age three to five.

This has resulted in what many observers term a “crisis in child care.” The question of child care has, to put it mildly, been studied a lot—by two royal commissions, a federal government task force on child care, which includes 20 separate studies, a House of Commons Special Committee on Child Care, and numerous briefs, papers, research studies and books.

The shortage of child care services was pointed out by the 1970 Royal Commission on the Status of Women, which, at that time, called for a national day care act to provide affordable good quality care for children of parents working outside the home. Fifteen years later, in the report of the Royal Commission on Equality in Employment, Judge Rosalie Abella said:

Considering that more than half of all Canadian children spend much of their time in the care of people other than their parents, and that more than half of all parents need child care services for their children, social policy should not be permitted to remain so greatly behind the times.

● (1520)

In 1987, although the issue is still controversial and the debate value-laden and emotional, the time seems ripe for the remedy. A national policy on child care is in the offing. A consensus exists, in the editorial pages, among families, social agencies and the general public on the need for expansion of child care services. A cool, practical approach to child care policies, based on the needs of Canadian families and on the facts—not nostalgia for the past—is what is needed.

Canada, which has not been a leader in the child care field, would do well to draw on the experience of several European countries, such as the Scandinavian countries, France and some East European countries. A range of policies exist which include the provision of extensive, flexible day care services of high quality as well as generous paid parental leave and benefits, and sufficient income support to give a parent the option of staying home to care for his or her child.

[Senator Spivak]

In Canada most working mothers must rely on informal arrangements, and only about 18 per cent of the children who need child care services have access to licensed care of a high quality.

I would like today to touch on the elements which are necessary and desirable, I think, in the context of child care policies for the present, and which will carry us into the future. There is the need for a solution to the shortage of child care services and facilities; the necessity of high-quality care; a comprehensive federal policy framework and funding mechanism; and an improved parental leave, parental benefits system. Our goal should be the establishment of an accessible comprehensive child care system which would grow to meet the needs of Canadian families through the provision of greatly enhanced public policy and funding.

To begin with the need for more child care services, most observers agree that this is the most urgent priority for the federal government. Estimates of the child care needs of Canadian families have been provided by the National Day-care Information Centre in Health and Welfare Canada and are based variously on the number of mothers in the labour force, parents in the labour force full time, and parents who are students. These estimates are varied, approximate and incomplete, yet, it is quite clear from even these figures—and no better ones are available—that the current number of about 220,517 licensed spaces in Canada represents only a fraction of the need.

Information about family preferences for child care also augments our knowledge of child care needs. Several studies have been done in Canada on family preferences for child care which show common patterns, namely, that parents' first concern is for quality of care, even though cost and convenience may be barriers; parents are concerned that they do not have access to quality care, and significant numbers express concern with care arrangements they presently have or have investigated; parents perceive different types of care as representing the best arrangements for children of different ages; for example, individualized care by sitters, family day care homes and relatives is seen as best for infants and very young children while centre care is seen as better for older pre-schoolers.

Federal government policy, then, in order to address these needs and preferences, must encourage provinces to develop and expand services through a shared-cost program and through the infusion of grants to create additional child care spaces. The services supported should include a variety of facilities to suit family needs. For example, the Government of Manitoba grants support to pre-school day care centres, nursery schools, school-age day care centres for children six to twelve years of age, occasional day care centres and family day care homes—all of which are licensed—and private home care, for which a licence is optional.

Government policies should include as well the development of services for parents at home with young children, part-day pre-school programs, parent resource centres and child care information services.

It is worth noting as well that the Special Committee on Child Care recommended the introduction of tax incentives, in the form of an accelerated capital cost allowance, to encourage business to set up workplace day care centres. Other corporate initiatives have met with some success in the United States to encourage the provision of more child care services.

To turn to the question of quality, research on the quality of care—though a fairly recent phenomenon—has progressed to the point where identifiable, measurable indicators of quality have become known. Assessment of the quality of child care centres can be carried out according to specific criteria, such as staff size, minimum qualifications for staff, maximum group sizes for children, curriculum and specific requirements with respect to physical space, health and safety, so that more precise, legislated child care standards are possible.

These standards should speak not only to the custodial aspects of care—that is the child's physical needs—but also to those factors which address the development of the child. Recent research indicates that early childhood development is critical for language learning, for the acquisition of certain intellectual skills and for emotional growth. Failure to develop adequately will affect a child's competence, self-esteem and performance in the future.

Critical to this important question of early childhood development as well is the staff of the child care centre or family day care home. It is essential, according to the most recent research, that those dealing with young children have education or training related to child development or early childhood education. At the moment not only are regulations relating to staff varied and generally inadequate among provinces—with Manitoba perhaps being a notable exception—but child care workers receive among the lowest salaries and benefits in Canada.

Federal policy, then, must reflect the most recent findings relating to quality of care, and federal funding through grants for child care services must incorporate higher salaries for child care staff, relative to each province, than now prevail.

Several other points relating to the question of quality care must be made. The provision of quality care needs more than legislated standards and an adequate monitoring system by provincial governments. The question must be asked: Who is the most appropriate sponsor of the service to ensure that quality care is provided? The answer is that parent involvement and control is the best insurance of quality, giving parents the opportunity to determine the kind of care which is best for their children.

Both Quebec and Manitoba have provided for parent involvement in service by requiring all centres which receive subsidies to be run by boards of directors, with significant parent participation on the boards. Federal funding should take note of this quality control measure—that is, of parental involvement—and also the issue of non-profit versus commercially operated child care as it relates to quality. On this contentious issue I must side with those who argue that the wish to maximize profits may seriously jeopardize the quality of care given. The continuous monitoring of quality, and the responsiveness to the needs of parents and communities, is not generally possible through a commercial operation.

Federal subsidies should not be provided to commercially operated centres both as a matter of principle and because the variables which influence a high standard of care are incompatible with measures which commercial centres, particularly chain operations, must employ to operate at a profit.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Spivak: All child care facilities, however, including for-profit facilities, should be subject to similar regulations governing quality of care.

How should the child care system be funded? At present most child care in Canada is supported to a significant extent by the fees paid by the users of care. Some assistance is made available by federal and provincial governments. The Canada Assistance Plan provides for the federal cost sharing of provincial and territorial expenditures for child care services on behalf of lower income families—those “in need” or “likely to be in need.” The child care expense deduction gives assistance, mostly to middle and higher income families, through the tax system. The federal government also offers grants to families through Canada Employment and Immigration and Indian and Northern Affairs.

This is neither an integrated approach to funding child care nor is it one suited to current development needs. The limitations of the Canada Assistance Plan are several.

First and most importantly, the method of assistance—through cost sharing of subsidies to low income parents—prohibits the necessary expansion of services; it does not provide for the sharing of capital costs up front; it does not clearly provide for the sharing of new kinds of services; and it is limited to sharing costs with the provinces on a 50-50 basis only so that poorer provinces, which do not have sufficient matching funds, cannot expand their services as readily as richer provinces.

The Child Care Expense Deduction also has structural problems, it benefits higher and middle income earners more than lower-income families, and, even then, many families cannot take advantage of this deduction because private caregivers may fail to give receipts for their service. The recent tax reform proposals, while dealing with other child benefits, have not dealt with the deduction for child care expenses. It is hoped that the government will deal with this matter in its measures on child care by converting the deduction to a tax credit.

A third problem on the question of financing is the issue of the level of parent fees. Manitoba has chosen to put a limit on the amount of fees charged, regardless of the parents' income, to avoid the “ghettoization” effect which could result if day care centres in more affluent areas were able to charge higher fees than other centres. Parent fees should be part of the financing of child care, but they should be based on ability to pay, and there needs to be a limit on the fee which parents can be expected to pay, regardless of income.

Thus, it appears that a new federal cost-sharing program is necessary, one in which federal funding would be linked to desirable objectives of child care policy, such as the expansion of services through grants; the imposition of standards by provincial governments, which would include all of the variables affecting quality based on current research; non-profit sponsorship and parent participation and control; fees which would adequately recognize the ability to pay; and the encouragement of a variety of services both for parents in the labour force and for those who choose to stay at home.

The federal government has a traditional role in assisting provinces and territories in providing for an adequate national level of social services. This role is enshrined in the Charter. It has done so through use of its spending authority, to encourage provinces to meet emerging national priorities, as well as through the tax system, and it must continue to do so.

There is one other element in a child care policy that I wish to mention, and that is the improvement of parental leave and benefits. The House of Commons Special Committee on Child Care stressed the importance of responding to parents' wishes for additional time to spend caring for very young children—parents, fathers as well as mothers. The report thus made a number of recommendations with respect to the Unemployment Insurance Act which would have the principal effect of extending the period of benefits for which maternity benefits are paid to 26 weeks, and allowing fathers to claim benefits for most of that period, at the discretion of the mother. The two-week period after the birth of the child would have to be taken by the mother. To make this recommendation effective, the committee also recommended that provinces review their labour legislation with a view to having parental leave periods conform with the proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act.

These recommendations should be strongly supported as an important first step towards the time when it will be possible for parents to combine work and family responsibilities with greater freedom.

Honourable senators, the Canadian Day Care Advocacy Association, in examining the submissions of almost 1,000 groups and individuals to the Special Committee on Child Care hearings in ten provinces and two territories, has said that a "relatively clear consensus on the main child care policy issues is emerging in Canada."

If so, that public support and advocacy can help transform child care in Canada from a welfare system to a public service. In their words, it will be a new service to provide high-quality, non-profit and user-friendly child care delivered through a range of services in order to meet a variety of community needs. It will include a system of extended and better paid parental leave and benefits and supports to help parents who stay at home.

The major objections to the realization of such a scheme by those who fear increasing government support of child care are those of cost. Who will pay for it? My answer is that the same question can be raised in any area of government policy, whether it is an enhanced defence policy or the creation of jobs through regional development programs. It is a question of priority and of cost-benefit analysis. Investment in child care, as in any other area of social policy, is labour intensive, and it has many other spin-off benefits. But the return on the investment, a solid foundation for the future, is likely to make paying for child-care the best investment the Canadian taxpayer has ever made.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I should like to praise my colleague who has just spoken. Her speech was enlightened, generous and civilized, and, unless it is the wish of someone else to do so, I would like to adjourn the debate.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I will not detain the Senate very long, but I do want to express my appreciation to Senator Spivak for presenting this analysis of a possible new system of day care service in Canada.

I was struck by her reference to the Canada Assistance Plan, which has been an integral part of the social system of Canada for a good number of years, and particularly her conclusion that the Canada Assistance Plan was not an appropriate vehicle or instrument by which day care could be provided in Canada. There may be good reasons why the Canada Assistance Plan is not suited for that purpose. Certainly it is not a source of funds for capital construction, and that may indeed be a disability. However, when Senator Spivak mentioned that the Canada Assistance Plan is not capable of expanding its services or providing new services, that possible flaw could be remedied by negotiation between the Government of Canada and the provinces to specify day care as one of the services that could be funded on a joint basis between the Government of Canada and the provincial governments.

That is just a comment on what the senator said, and she might take it into account as she continues her reflections upon the question of day care.

Another point was also well made, namely, that the Canada Assistance Plan was funded on a 50-50 basis with the provinces. Of course, as Senator Robertson would know, it is more difficult for the poorer provinces to provide that 50 per cent than it is for the wealthier provinces. That has been one of the conundrums of Canadian public policy for a long time.

I believe at one point Senator Spivak did espouse a shared-cost program with the provinces as a way of providing day care services. That same flaw would apply to any shared-cost program unless there were a provision to grant greater assistance to the poorer provinces, as was done under the Medicare Program. As I recall, the original program provided for a higher proportion of costs to be borne by the Government of Canada for the poorer provinces.

Senator Doody: There is the equalization formula.

Senator MacEachen: Of course, as Senator Doody points out, there is the equalization program.

The purpose of my comments is not to pour cold water on the proposals made by Senator Spivak, quite the contrary, it is simply to underline some of the factors which she introduced into her speech, and simply to encourage her to examine, perhaps, once again, whether the Canada Assistance Plan does not offer some way, even on an interim basis, to finance day care services in the country.

Senator Spivak: Is this a question?

Senator MacEachen: It was a comment.

Senator Spivak: Honourable senators, I am certainly not an expert on matters such as variable cost-sharing formulas. I do not know for certain that the Canada Assistance Plan could not be altered in such a way as to provide a variable cost-sharing formula other than 50-50. It is not that the Canada Assistance Plan could not be used for a national child care program in the same way as other social services. According to my conversations with, and reading the suggestions of, those who advocate a national child care policy, I find that it is the feeling of the majority of observers that the area of child care has now reached the stage where it is a body of social policy, in the same way perhaps as public education or medicare, which requires its own mechanism and cost-sharing formula. One should not tinker around any longer with what basically is a piece of legislation designed to assist families in need or who are likely to be in need. This is more the sort of program which affects a great number of families in Canada, regardless of income, and it deserves its own piece of legislation.

● (1540)

With all due respect, senator, you are far more experienced than I in these matters, and it might very well be possible to amend that other piece of legislation and to be able to present this in the proper context. I guess that what I was trying to say is that these are the principles that I think should be incorporated, and it seems to me that those principles should be incorporated, from what I gather from other observers, in a separate piece of legislation.

On motion of Senator Gigantès, debate adjourned.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-22

POWER TO ENGAGE SERVICES—NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Bonnell wanted to give notice today of a motion to be moved on Monday. He is not able to be present today, so I will do it for him.

I give notice that on Monday next, June 29, I will move that:

The Special Committee of the Senate on the subject-matter of the Bill C-22, An Act to amend the Patent Act and to provide for certain matters in relation thereto, have power to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as are necessary.

For some reason, while the committee has the funds to do this, it did not have the authority to do it.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

EQUALIZATION AND FINANCIAL MATTERS—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PREMIER OF MANITOBA AND GOVERNMENT OF CANADA—MOTION ADOPTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, May 26, 1987, moved:

That there be laid before this House copies of all correspondence from 4th September, 1984, to 30th April, 1987, relative to equalization and financial matters exchanged by the Premier of the Province of Manitoba and (i) the Prime Minister of Canada; (ii) the Minister of Finance of Canada; and (iii) the Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations).

EQUALIZATION AND FINANCIAL MATTERS—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN MANITOBA MINISTER OF FINANCE AND GOVERNMENT OF CANADA—MOTION ADOPTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, May 26, 1987, moved:

That there be laid before this House copies of all correspondence from 4th September, 1984, to 30th April, 1987, relative to equalization and financial matters exchanged by the Minister of Finance of the Province of Manitoba and (i) the Prime Minister of Canada; (ii) the Minister of Finance of Canada; and (iii) the Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations).

EQUALIZATION AND FINANCIAL MATTERS—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PREMIER OF QUEBEC AND GOVERNMENT OF CANADA—MOTION ADOPTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, May 26, 1987, moved:

That there be laid before this House copies of all correspondence from 4th September, 1984, to 30th April, 1987, relative to equalization and financial matters exchanged by the Premier of the Province of Québec and (i) the Prime Minister of Canada; (ii) the Minister of Finance of Canada; and (iii) the Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations).

EQUALIZATION AND FINANCIAL MATTERS—TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN QUEBEC MINISTER OF FINANCE AND GOVERNMENT OF CANADA—MOTION ADOPTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, May 26, 1987, moved:

That there be laid before this House copies of all correspondence from 4th September, 1984, to 30th April, 1987, relative to equalization and financial matters exchanged by the Minister of Finance of the Province of Québec and (i) the Prime Minister of Canada; (ii) the Minister of Finance of Canada; and (iii) the Minister of State (Federal-Provincial Relations).

He said: Honourable senators, I have moved these four motions together because they are all in similar form, except for a slight difference. My comments will be brief. As all honourable senators are aware, equalization payments are of particular importance to small provinces. Provinces such as my own experienced serious conditions as a result of the depression of the 1930s, and it was only because of the Rowell-Sirois Report and the eventual equalization structure that we were enabled to have any standard of services whatsoever.

Recently there seems to have been a trend away from equalization payments. I know that my own province has been in correspondence with the federal government on this matter, and it has been the subject of dispute between the Province of Manitoba and the federal government. I noted recently that the Province of Quebec was having not exactly the same problem but, nevertheless, problems with the question of equalization, and it was unhappy with what was happening there.

It is for that reason that I have asked for this correspondence in order that I can get the information to see what is the problem, and to see whether or not we should re-examine here in the Senate the whole question of equalization, which is critical for the small provinces of this country.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt each of the four motions?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motions agreed to.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, YEAR OF PROCLAMATION (NEWFOUNDLAND ACT)—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government), pursuant to notice of Monday, June 22, 1987, moved:

That, whereas section 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province to which the amendment applies;

Now therefore the Senate resolves that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation issued by Her Excellency the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada in accordance with the schedule hereto:

SCHEDULE AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

1. (1) Section 3 of the Newfoundland Act is renumbered as subsection 3(1).

(2) Section 3 of the said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

“(2) a reference to this Act, or a reference to the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the Schedule to this Act, shall be deemed to include a reference to any amendments thereto”

2. (1) Term 17 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the Schedule to the said Act is renumbered as Term 17(1).

(2) Term 17 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the Schedule to the said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following:

“(2) For the purposes of paragraph one of this Term, the Pentecostal Assemblies of Newfoundland have in Newfoundland all the same rights and privileges with respect to denominational schools and denominational colleges as any other class or classes of persons had by law in Newfoundland at the date of Union, and the words “all such schools” in paragraph (a) of paragraph one of this Term and the words “all such colleges” in paragraph (b) of paragraph one of this Term include, respectively, the schools and the colleges of the Pentecostal Assemblies of Newfoundland.”

3. This amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, year of proclamation (Newfoundland Act).

He said: Honourable senators, I should like to take a few moments of your time to speak to this motion. As Senator Eugene Forsey pointed out this morning, there are certain differences in all provinces, and there is nothing unique about a special arrangement with any one province.

This particular motion, which seeks an amendment to the Constitution of Canada, deals with the education system in Newfoundland. As honourable senators are aware, Newfoundland is unique in that of all the provinces it is the only one in which education is totally organized on a denominational basis.

The Government of Newfoundland is seeking an amendment to Term 17 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada, with a view to entrenching the rights of the Pentecostal Assemblies in Newfoundland with respect to education.

At the time of union in 1949, seven denominations were specifically authorized by the law of Newfoundland to operate schools and to share in public funds for this purpose. They were the Anglican, the Roman Catholic, the United, and the Presbyterian and Congregational Churches; also the Salvation Army and the Seventh Day Adventists.

Subsequently, all of the denominations have come together as an integrated school system, with the exception of the Roman Catholics, which still operate a separate school system.

The Pentecostal Assemblies were recognized under provincial law as being organized for educational purposes in 1954. So they, too, operate a second denominational school system. As a matter of fact, they were not protected by Term 17 of the Terms of Union, their school rights having been created after the confederation with Canada.

There has been a continuing desire by the Pentecostal Assemblies in Newfoundland to be put in a position constitutionally similar to the other privileged school-operating denominations. Therefore, a previous proposal to amend Term 17 of the Terms of Union was introduced in the House of Commons in 1971, but it died on the Order Paper with the dissolution of that Parliament in the fall of 1972.

In November 1984 the Government of Newfoundland made a new proposal to amend Term 17 to include the Pentecostal Assemblies.

This particular proposed amendment, notice of which I gave a few days ago, would do here in the Senate what has already been done in the House of Commons, and what has already been done by the provincial Assembly in the Province of Newfoundland.

The proposed amendment would give constitutional protection to the Pentecostal Assemblies with respect to educational rights, and would put them in the same constitutional position as the other recognized denominations in the province. In effect, it would correct the current inequality.

Under section 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982, any provision of the Constitution of Canada that applies to one or more, but not all, provinces may be amended by way of proclamation by the Governor General following resolutions of the Senate, the House of Commons and of the legislature of each province to which the amendment applies.

As I have said, the House of Commons has passed the resolution and the Newfoundland Legislative Assembly has passed the amendment. It remains only for the Senate to do the same.

The amendment would allow the entrenchment of the rights of the Pentecostal denomination in Newfoundland on a basis similar to the other recognized denominations. It does not purport to create new rights for the Pentecostal Assemblies or to change in any way the existing education system in Newfoundland. It merely aims at entrenching the existing rights.

I might point out that no other religious group in the province is currently seeking to operate its own schools and to receive government funding in this respect. All other groups are very small in number. I believe the next largest non-recognized group for this purpose are the Jehovah's Witnesses, who have something in excess of 2,000 reported members; and, as I say, they are not looking for this kind of entrenchment.

So, honourable senators, I commend this motion to you and ask that you consider it favourably.

On motion of Senator Petten, for Senator Lewis, debate adjourned.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

REPORT OF STANDING SENATE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-15

FRIDAY, June 26, 1987

The Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs has the honour to present its

TENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of the Bill C-15, An Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, November 4, 1986, examined the said subject-matter and now reports with the following comments and recommendations.

The Committee has held extensive hearings and has heard from a number of witnesses. (List of Witnesses who appeared before the Committee and Submissions received are attached as Appendices A and B.)

During the course of our deliberations, the Committee was kept apprised of amendments made to the Bill in the Legislative Committee of the House of Commons. This has made our study of the Bill considerably easier, for many of those amendments constitute changes upon which we would have made recommendations. Those changes having been made, we wish to indicate our full support for them, and we would urge the government to accept those amendments when the Bill returns to the House for final consideration.

This being said, the Committee still has some concerns about certain aspects of the Bill. The first has to do with sentencing. Although we support the enactment of new sexual offences concerning misconduct with children and young persons, we note that they have the potential for the imposition of long penitentiary terms of imprisonment. While long sentences may have a deterrent effect on some offenders, we are not convinced that they will serve a useful purpose for the majority of sexual offenders. What is needed in this area is more treatment for such offenders, rather than longer penitentiary terms alone. In this regard, we would recommend that the government accelerate and give special consideration to its plans to rework the law dealing with mentally disordered offenders.

Another aspect of the Bill with which we are concerned also has to do with sentencing. The sentence structure of the proposed legislation contains certain anomalies. For example, the penalties prescribed for the offence in s. 166 (parent or guardian procuring sexual activity) do not appear to be proportionate when compared to the punishment for sexual interference (s. 140) or sexual exploitation (s. 146). We recommend that, when the review of the legislation is undertaken four years hence, rationalization of sentence structures be given consideration. We also have a specific recommendation with respect to the offence of "simple" bestiality (subs. 155(1)). We see no reason for the retention of a severely punished indictable prosecution option. We recommend that the offence be punishable solely on summary conviction.

The re-enactment of the vagrancy offence in paragraph 175(1)(e) of the Code raises some questions. We note that some attempt was made to limit its scope in the Legislative Committee by deleting the words "or wandering". We remain concerned, however, by this offence, which appears to have the potential to unnecessarily inhibit persons who have served their sentences. We were assured by departmental officials that the offence is rarely prosecuted; that it is used by the police as a means of controlling the movements of convicted sex offenders, who may be encouraged to comply by the threat of arrest and prosecution.

This explanation of the offence has not served to alleviate our discomfort with it. We do not take issue with the submission that it may be necessary to limit the access of offenders to places where they may victimize children again. But we do question whether the blanket offence in paragraph 175(1)(e) is a proportionate response, and whether it is constitutional. We believe that it is another matter which must be given serious consideration when the legislation is reviewed in four years.

The Committee fully supports the repeal of corroboration requirements in s. 246.4. We agree that there should be no absolute rule that children's evidence must be corroborated before it can support a conviction. We are concerned, however, about the re-enactment in that section of words first added to the Criminal Code in 1983, to the effect that a judge, in certain sexual offence prosecutions "...shall not instruct the jury that it is unsafe to find the accused guilty in the absence of corroboration".

Some witnesses who appeared before the Committee took the position that this provision is precluding judges from making any comment at all on the absence of corroborative evidence. Departmental officials, on the other hand, assured us that the section was intended to, and in practice does no more than prevent a presiding judge from making an instruction as to the "unsafe" nature of uncorroborated convictions. As yet, however, there have been no appellate decisions upholding this interpretation.

We are of the opinion that a trial judge should be free to comment on the absence of corroboration, so long as he or she refrains from making an instruction of the kind noted above. We recommend that the Department closely monitor decisions under s. 246.4, and take immediate action if those decisions place restrictions on the traditional role of the judiciary in providing assistance to the trier of fact in the assessment of evidence.

During our deliberations, the Committee gave serious consideration to an amendment to s. 442 which would have the effect of placing restrictions on the identification in the media of persons accused of sexual offences until conviction or discharge, analogous to the restrictions on identification of victims of such offences. Although we remain sympathetic to that idea because of the unique and serious consequences that unfounded allegations can have, we ultimately accepted the contention of departmental officials that the implications for law enforcement of such an amendment need more study. We would urge, however, that the review committee should examine this matter when the legislation is studied in four years.

Our next comment is with respect to proposed s. 643.1, which allows for the pre-trial video-taping and admissibility, in proceedings, of the testimony of complainants under 18 in sexual offence prosecutions. We have misgivings about this section. We recognize that it is intended to facilitate the presentation of the evidence of children who may be intimidated or traumatized by the prospect of giving evidence in a criminal court, or who may be asked to recount events at trial that occurred some considerable time before. We acknowledge that the intent of the section is beneficial, and that it seeks to deal with a genuine problem relating to children's evidence.

Our concerns have less to do with the theoretical need for such a provision, than with its possible practical effects. A number of witnesses contended that such taping may be counter-productive; it may have the effect of focusing attention less on the child's evidence than on inconsistencies between a taped statement and oral evidence. It could open new avenues for the discrediting of children's evidence, and divert attention from the real issues at trial. In several jurisdictions in the United States, apparently, issues such as these have led to the effective abandonment of video-taping under similar legislation.

The use of video-taping will be permissive; the Crown will not be obliged to use this method of taking evidence. When it is used, its impact must be closely monitored. We urge the review committee to study the value and the effects of this new procedure with great care.

We would also suggest that more guidance should be given as to how video-taping is to be carried out. The wording of proposed s. 643.1 is so vague that there could be considerable variations in the techniques used. We have been informed by departmental officials that the provinces will be formulating guidelines to govern taping. We trust that this process will result in uniform national standards. Accordingly, we would recommend that steps be taken to formulate nationally-applicable regulations governing matters such as editing; who may question children who make taped statements; the use of certain camera techniques; what must be shown of the questioner and respondent; and verification of elapsed time. We believe that standards such as these would not add much expense, if any, to the process; and they would promote a large degree of uniformity and fairness, as well as facilitating the ultimate admissibility of tapes. They would also ensure equality of treatment, and avoid a case-by-case accretion of procedural safeguards.

Our final comment has to do with the review committee. It should have the most comprehensive information base available to permit it to perform its task. Thus we would suggest that the Department of Justice (if they have not done so already) should ensure that statistical and other information as to how the legislation is administered and enforced once it is brought into effect is gathered and made available.

The Committee heard evidence of the need for a national centre of expertise on all matters related to sexual abuse of children. The Committee recommends that the federal government encourage the establishment of such a centre which, as part of its mandate, would collect and disseminate accurate information regarding sexual abuse of children.

The Committee heard a great deal of evidence as to the traumatizing effect of court procedures on children and in particular the psychologically destructive impact of prolonged delays. The Committee urges the Minister of Justice to discuss this serious concern with his provincial counterparts at the earliest possible opportunity with a view to finding a means of facilitating and expediting the judicial process where children are involved.

In conclusion, subject to the concerns which we have expressed above, we wish once again to express our approval of the Bill in general.

Respectfully submitted,

JOAN B. NEIMAN
Chairman

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-63

FRIDAY, June 26, 1987

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

SEVENTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of the Bill C-63, An Act to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, 16th June, 1987, examined the subject-matter of the said Bill and now reports as follows:

The Committee heard evidence from the Honourable Bernard Valcourt, Minister of State (Small Business and Tourism), and officials.

This Bill seeks to streamline the regulations governing the loans provided under the Small Businesses Loans Act (SBLA) and to make fishermen eligible for loans guaranteed under this Act. At present, fishermen are able to borrow funds under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act (FILA). However, the authority to guarantee loans under FILA is set to expire on 30th June, 1987.

For fishermen, the major advantages of bringing them within the purview of the SBLA are: a) that they will be able to borrow funds for a wider range of activities, including the purchase of land, and b) there will be a significant increase in the funds available for government guaranteed loans, from $30 million to $2.5 billion. Even though the money is spread among a larger number of borrowers, it will be less likely that fishermen will be unable to borrow money during any lending period because the funds available have been exhausted. The one major drawback for fishermen will be that that the government guarantee will cover up to 85% of the value of the loan, rather than 100%, as is the case under FILA. The increased risk-sharing by the lender may make it more difficult for some fishermen to obtain a loan. Other differences between the SBLA and FILA are set out in an appendix to this report.

Your Committee recommends that the Bill, when examined by the Senate, be favourably considered.

APPENDIX

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I rise on a question of privilege. Last Friday, and during my absence—and I have only been able to take cognizance of Hansard just a minute or two ago—Senator Bélisle rose on a point of order. On page 1440 of Debates of the Senate for June 26, 1987, he said:

I should like to draw to the attention of all honourable senators that Senator Corbin's stance on Bill S-7 is far from being fair to this bill.

There is extraneous noise, and it bothers me.

Senator Frith: I think it is being looked into.

Senator Corbin: I guess the door to the translation booth must have been open. Would someone correct that problem, because every time I open my mouth there is an echo. Maybe I should sit down and shut up!

In any case, Senator Bélisle—from whom I was quoting—says:

... Senator Corbin's stance on Bill S-7 is far from being fair to this bill.

Of course my stance is not fair with respect to the contents of the bill! It is a debatable and disputed matter. What do you expect? He goes on to state:

It has been on the Orders of the Day since April 2. I have, since June 2, asked Senator Corbin when he will speak to the matter. Last night, when we adjourned, I went to him and asked him again if he was going to speak today. His reply was: "Senator, when will you be taking your retirement? Then I will speak."

I never said, "Then I will speak." Senator Bélisle then says:

This, honourable senators, was not considered by me to be a humorous joke.

He then goes on with considerations about the bill.

It is beyond my understanding that Senator Bélisle would take my comment to him seriously, the way he did. I am chagrined that he did, because that was certainly not the position I intended to take, namely, that I would not speak until he retired. First of all, that is no business of mine, and, second, I do not intend—and I repeat it to him, because I told him privately—to hold up the bill unduly.

Nevertheless, I was in the process of continuing my research on some aspects of the legislation, on some aspects of the procedure, and on some aspects of Opus Dei. Surely to goodness it is my right in this place to adjourn the debate on a matter on which I have already begun to speak. I understand that it is done regularly. In fact, I have witnessed a number of senators speaking to a number of questions—whether they were inquiries or bills—and repeatedly asking for the adjournment of a debate. So I do not consider that I am abusing a situation.

There is also another consideration. Suppose that I do finish speaking today or tomorrow, or next October sometime, does that mean there is not someone else in this chamber who would want to speak to the second reading of the bill to incorporate the Regional Vicar of Opus Dei? Senator Bélisle does not know that and I do not know it.

I will simply repeat that I intend to terminate my comments on Bill S-7 once I have completed my research. That, in itself, is not an unusual position for an honourable senator in this place to take, because there are many precedents to that effect.

Honourable senators, by way of final comment, I would like to say that this is very much a private bill, and a private bill, in my book, comes after all the rest, and it so happens that I had other priorities and other urgent matters to attend to in the Senate of Canada, both in this chamber and in its committees. I cannot find the time I would like to put into the completion of the remarks I wish to make with respect to Bill S-7. I do not liked to be pushed against a wall. I do not like to be asked every day, "Will you speak? Will you speak? Will you speak?" I will speak when I am bloody ready to speak.

Thank you, honourable senators.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, may I be permitted to say that I hope that when the honourable gentleman is ready, I will answer his challenge. That is all I have to say now.

STANDING RULES AND ORDERS

SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat, Chairman of the Senate Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, presented the following report:

Monday, June 29, 1987

The Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders has the honour to present its

SECOND REPORT

It has been brought to your Committee's attention that certain committees of the Senate have been allowing legal counsel, research assistants and other persons who are not members of the committees to direct questions to witnesses appearing before those committees.

This practice is inconsistent with Senate practice and is in contravention of Rule 77(7) of the Rules of the Senate.

Your Committee urges all committee chairmen to conduct committee meetings in conformity with the Rules of the Senate, and to ensure that the questioning of witnesses is conducted by senators only.

Respectfully submitted,

GILDAS MOLGAT
Chairman

CONSIDERATION OF SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: With leave of the Senate, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Molgat: Since the report of the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders is a very short one, honourable senators, my comments need not be very long, either. It has been brought to the attention of that committee that there have been some infractions of the rules regarding who can ask questions at meetings of any committee of the Senate. Rule 77(7) is clear that no committee has any power that the Senate does not have unless the Senate has agreed to give to the committee that power. Due to the fact that the only persons who can speak here in the Senate chamber, unless the Senate agrees otherwise, are honourable senators, then, by the same token, in committees the only persons who can question witnesses are senators themselves.

The Standing Rules and Orders Committee discussed this matter when it was raised at one of its meetings. It was not felt that any new rule was necessary. We thought that it might be wise to report that we had discussed the matter and to remind honourable senators who are chairmen of committees of rule 77(7) in particular, especially where it has happened that staff or others have proceeded to question witnesses in committees. If there is the need for questions from staff, it is felt that the staff member should pass the questions on to an honourable senator and that the senator should proceed to do the questioning.

Honourable senators, I did not feel it was necessary to move the adoption of the report because it does not involve any new rule. It was simply a report to inform honourable senators.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, this debate is considered closed.

[Senator Molgat.]

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I have not had an opportunity to study the report and, with that in mind, would adjourn the debate.

On motion of Senator Hastings, debate adjourned.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-22

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, Chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Subject Matter of Bill C-22, presented the following report:

Monday, June 29, 1987

The Special Committee of the Senate on the Subject Matter of Bill C-22, An Act to amend the Patent Act and to provide for certain matters in relation thereto, has the honour to present its

FOURTH REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized by the Senate on April 2, 1987 to study and report upon the subject-matter of Bill C-22, and on June 25, 1987, to which was referred Bill C-22, An Act to amend the Patent Act and to provide for certain matters in relation thereto, respectfully requests that it be empowered to engage the services of such counsel and technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of such study.

On May 12, 1987, the Senate approved a budget of the Special Committee which included an amount for such personnel. To date the Committee has not found it necessary to hire the necessary personnel. Now that the Bill has been referred to the Committee, it respectfully requests that power to engage such services be granted.

Respectfully submitted,

M. LORNE BONNELL
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I believe that some honourable senators would like to have a copy of the report.

The Hon. the Speaker: While the report is being circulated, I believe that Senator Sinclair wishes to table a report.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AND DUTIES RELIEF ACT

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-69 TABLED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to table its eighteenth report respecting the subject matter of Bill C-69, to amend the Customs Tariff and the Duties Relief Act, in advance of the said bill coming before the Senate, or any matter relating thereto.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate of this day and that it form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see appendix, p. 1504.)

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TWENTY-EIGHTH MEETING HELD AT VANCOUVER, BRITISH COLUMBIA—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. R. James Balfour: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I give notice that tomorrow, Wednesday, June 30, 1987, I will call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-eighth Meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-Parliamentary Group, held at Vancouver, British Columbia, from June 4 to 8, 1987, and to the report of the said meeting.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

FISHERIES

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO PUBLISH AND DISTRIBUTE INTERIM REPORT ON MARKETING OF FISH IN CANADA

Hon. Jack Marshall, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That in the event of an adjournment of the Senate which exceeds a week, the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries be authorized to publish and distribute its second interim report on its examination of the marketing of fish in Canada and all implications thereof, as soon as it becomes available; and

That in the event of a prorogation of Parliament, the Honourable Senators authorized to act for and on behalf of the Senate in all matters relating to the internal economy of the Senate during any period between sessions of Parliament or between Parliaments, be authorized to publish and distribute the above-mentioned interim report.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

● (1420)

ADJOURNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until tomorrow, Tuesday, June 30, 1987, at 10 o'clock in the forenoon.

Motion agreed to.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-22

CONSIDERATION OF FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE—DEBATE
ADJOURNED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the fourth report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Subject Matter of Bill C-22, to amend the Patent Act and to provide for certain matters in relation thereto.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I believe copies of the fourth report have been made available to you.

The Hon. the Speaker: Would honourable senators prefer to have a little time to read the report? We can always revert to it.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Your Honour, as it is so short, I think we can read it as we go along.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I have a few comments before I give an explanation of this report. This morning the committee met in camera. The committee feels that the bill requires further study. In particular, some doubts were raised about the constitutionality of the proposed Prices Review Board under the Patent Act. The committee wishes to hear expert testimony in regard to the constitutionality of this bill. The committee also wishes to conduct a clause-by-clause study of the bill and to examine other matters that are relevant to it. As chairman of this special committee, I would like to bring to the attention of the Senate the fact that such further study may take several weeks. The report before you asks that, if necessary, the committee have the power to hire counsel. I believe that a motion is now on the order paper giving notice of that committee recommendation made this morning. Therefore, honourable senators, I move the adoption of the report.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Do we not have two motions for the same thing on the order paper? On Friday Senator Frith moved a motion to enable this committee to engage counsel, and now—

Senator Frith: I gave notice.

Senator Phillips:—Senator Bonnell is giving notice in his motion. I do not believe that we should have two motions for the same thing on the order paper.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I gave notice on Friday, as Senator Phillips has said, that I would move such a motion. I have not moved it, so there is no motion of mine before the Senate asking for this authority. There is now before the Senate, however, a motion from Senator Bonnell with the same effect. Obviously, if that motion is passed, I shall not be moving my motion.

Hon. George van Roggen: Would the Honourable Senator Bonnell accept a question?

Senator Bonnell: Yes.

Senator van Roggen: It is my understanding that the government of my province of British Columbia was not able to or did not appear before the committee when it was taking evidence across the country but has since communicated with the committee to the effect that they have concerns with the bill.

In addition to the other matters you have mentioned you would be looking at, are your plans to take evidence from the Province of British Columbia so that its representations can be on the record?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, in answer to my honourable friend, the committee has not definitely decided what they will do. However, they have discussed the possibility of determining the impact on the different provinces. No definite decision was made on whether there would be any further discussions with British Columbia or any of the other provinces.

Basically, this morning the committee decided that they have heard most of the witnesses across the provinces that they need to hear, and now they need to hear expert witnesses.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, in view of the fact that Senator Bonnell has asked the Senate permission to hire staff for the special committee dealing with the subject matter of Bill C-22, including technical experts, lawyers and probably cost accountants too, could he tell us just how much has been spent by this committee to this day and whether the amount he is seeking will provide him with adequate funds.

Could he tell us also whether the committee is planning to travel outside the National Capital region to meet experts in Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia or elsewhere? Do his fellow committee members and he believe that their travelling is over?

[Senator Bonnell.]

[English]

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, as you well know, the Senate graciously gave me some funds some time ago. I, being born a Scotsman, did not use all those funds. In fact, I have hired no one up to this date. I did most of the work myself with my committee. We hired no expert advice. We did not even hire a secretary. We have produced this twenty-six page report without hiring any staff.

However, we did spend some money travelling across Canada. There were transportation costs. We travelled at economy rates, and I can assure Senator Phillips that the hotels we stayed in were not first class hotels. Some of the hotels did not even have elevators. We did not go over our budget, and we still have funds available to hire staff, if we decide we need them.

The fact that you are giving me permission to hire staff does not necessarily mean that we will be hiring them. I do not want to bring the Senate back in the middle of July for the sole purpose of obtaining permission to hire a secretary or legal counsel. By doing it today, I thought you might enjoy your summer holidays for a week or two before I report back to you.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, is there any way of cutting back on the interference? I am having a great deal of difficulty, and I want to grasp every word that comes from my esteemed colleague across the way. I do not know if the doors are open in the interpretation booth or if there is some sort of diabolical device that has been planted up there to try to distract us.

The Hon. the Speaker: Senator Doody, I understand from Black Rod that the doors are closed in the interpretation booth. It is strictly a technical problem. Technicians are on their way to try to repair it.

Senator Doody: I thank Mr. Speaker for the information, and we look forward to the prompt arrival of the technicians.

I would like to say to Senator Bonnell in passing that if, indeed, the Special Committee on Bill C-22 decides—and it has decided, obviously—to meet beyond the 30th of this month, then certainly the government side of this house will be only too happy to cooperate in any way that we can, including having the Senate sit during that period.

Senator Bonnell: Thank you, Mr. Deputy Leader.

[Translation]

Senator Simard: Honourable senators, I do not think that Senator Bonnell has answered my question. He has told us that the committee had saved money, that the members and their supporting staff had found accommodation in hotels which were not necessarily first class and where there were no elevators.

He has failed to answer my two questions, namely, whether he felt he would have enough money to hire all the staff mentioned in the fourth report, and also whether he was planning to travel during the summer outside of the National Capital region.

• (1430)

[English]

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I think we have sufficient funds to hire the experts we need, the people we need and the staff we need without receiving any extra funds.

As far as where we might travel as a committee during the summer is concerned, that will be decided by the committee, not by the chairman. The chairman always carries out the wishes of his committee, but if there is somewhere that the committee decides they should go to hear somebody, then I suspect that the decision will be made by the committee. If they wish to send me to hear a special witness and bring back that news to the committee, then maybe they will send me or some other delegate. I would not want to commit my committee to not travel anywhere during the summer months, but I am telling you that it is not our intention as a committee to travel across this country to hear any more witnesses.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to Senator Simard's. I suppose that this report is in the form in which—I have not read a sufficient number of them to know—a report is usually couched. You have obviously given notice that Bill C-22 will have a longer life and will not pass the light of day before recess—that has been made abundantly clear—but why are you not precise, Senator Bonnell? You indicate here that you were given authority to hire special personnel and you did not.

Senator Frith: He had funds, but did not have the authority.

Senator MacDonald: But presumably you have the funds to hire them, so why do you come back to ask for that which you have already received?

Senator Frith: He did not. He had the funds, but—

Senator Olson: That is your interpretation.

Senator MacDonald: It is?

Senator Olson: He did not have the authority to hire them. That is what he is asking for.

Senator Petten: He has the money.

Senator Argue: He has the money, but he cannot spend it.

An Hon. Senator: He has the cheques, but not the clout!

Senator Bonnell: To get the record straight for my good friend Senator MacDonald, yes, when we put through the motion earlier in April we put through a budget. However, we neglected to seek authority to hire the services of such counsel, technical, clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the purpose of such study. That routine paragraph, which is included in most motions, was somehow left out. As a result, I am adding it in here now as part of this report and putting the motion today. Ordinarily—in most other motions of the Senate—it would have gone in with the budget and with the motion to set up the committee.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I am not quite sure whether this question should be directed to Senator Bonnell or Senator Frith. I believe the question would more properly be directed to Senator Frith, Deputy Chairman of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy, Budgets and Administration.

I have here a copy of the budget proposed by the Special Committee on the Subject Matter of Bill C-22, which was approved by the Internal Economy Committee. Why did the Internal Economy Committee grant funds for a purpose for which the special committee was not empowered?

An Hon. Senator: You are a member of that committee!

Senator Phillips: I opposed that; I opposed it!

Senator Doody: I opposed it, too!

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, it is because we made a mistake, and we are hoping that we can rectify it now.

Senator Phillips: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Phillips, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald, that further debate be adjourned until the next sitting of the Senate.

An Hon. Senator: You are delaying the whole thing!

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: No!

Senator Frith: Why are we adjourning it?

Senator Doody: Senator Murray will be with us late this afternoon. He will probably be too late for this session, but he will be here tomorrow. It is conceivable that he may wish to have a word on this matter.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, then, to adopt the motion, honourable senators?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I know that the motion to adjourn is not debatable, but I would like to say that tomorrow I will not be here myself because of other matters. I hope that honourable senators realize that if they do not pass this motion, you will probably not get your report back until sometime late in the fall.

Senator Doody: I find it difficult to reply and still be gracious! I fully appreciate Senator Bonnell's difficulty—I know why he cannot be with us tomorrow; and I commiserate with him and I fully understand—but whether holding this debate over for one day so that the Leader of the Government can comment on it is worthy of keeping the whole Senate here until the fall escapes me. However, there may be some logic in there; if there is, we will try to find it. All Senator Phillips suggested was that we adjourn the debate today so that Senator Murray can speak on it tomorrow, if he wants to—perhaps he will not want to.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I think that the request to adjourn the debate for one day in order to give Senator Murray an opportunity to speak to it is reasonable. We can vote on it tomorrow. No one will be hired between now and tomorrow, so I suggest that we support the motion for adjournment on that basis.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

On motion of Senator Phillips, debate adjourned.

QUESTION PERIOD

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, at the risk of being repetitious, I have to repeat that Senator Murray is not with us at this point. He will be in town later this afternoon—perhaps too late for this sitting. He will be here tomorrow, but, in the meantime, I will take notice of any questions that honourable senators wish to present.

TAX REFORM

WHITE PAPER—TWENTY CONSULTANTS—FEMALE REPRESENTATION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, on June 23 Senator Doody provided a delayed answer to a question concerning the consultants on tax reform. The response is listed on pages 1339 and 1340 of the Debates of the Senate. As it reports subtly, the response indicates that there was not a single woman on the Income Tax Panel or the Sales Tax Panel.

I was in contact with a member of one of those panels over the weekend who tells me that there were indeed two women on those panels. Can we ask the government to go back to see whether there were other members who were not listed in that response? I understand the name of one of them is Eleanore Richardson and the other woman was a partner in Clarkson, Gordon in Toronto. It may be that the government has not done as badly as it thinks it has.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I understand that the names of the two ladies whom Senator Marsden mentioned are not listed in the answer, is that correct?

An Hon. Senator: That's right!

Senator Marsden: There is a Richardson listed, but the initial is not the same as the person that I have listed.

Senator Doody: I will do what I can to clear up the mystery, honourable senators.

[Senator Frith.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

RELOCATION OF EXECUTIVE OFFICES FROM EDMONTON TO MONTREAL

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, would the deputy leader take as notice a question about—it is rumour, but it is almost more than rumour, because one of the members of Parliament of the House of Commons from Edmonton has complained about it—the CNR planning to move a number of the executive offices from Edmonton to Montreal.

Could the Deputy Leader of the Government take as notice the question about this and report tomorrow so that we can find out whether it is only a rumour, if it is, in fact, happening, or if, in fact, CN intends to move these executive offices. If that is so, what does the government intend to do about it?

● (1440)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will attempt to track it down. I am not quite clear as to the origin of the statement. I missed part of the question, and I am not sure if it is a rumour, more than a rumour, or whether it is a quotation of a fact from some member of Parliament. If it is an allegation by some member of Parliament, obviously it would be easier to track down, but if it is just a rumour, we may never be able to trace it. How does one trace down rumours?

Senator Olson: I used all of those terms so there would be no misunderstanding. I do not know whether it is a fact yet because I do not believe that CN has acknowledged it.

It has been discussed in the other place to some extent, and a number of reporters have talked to various people within CN about it. So, it is more than a rumour. There is some substance behind it.

I think that if the honourable senator reads my question as I put it a few moments ago, he will see what I mean.

Senator Doody: I will see what I can find out.

[Later]

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, on the subject of the transfer of CN executive officers from Edmonton to Montreal, it seems to be of sufficient substance that Mayor Laurence Decore, Mayor of Edmonton, is sending a telegram to the Prime Minister and to the Minister of Transport about this subject. I am sure that Senator Olson and all of us will be interested in the reply to the mayor's telegram.

AGRICULTURE

DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS TO WESTERN GRAIN FARMERS FOR 1987 CROP YEAR—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I wonder if the Deputy Leader of the Government has a reply to the question I have addressed a number of times, and that is whether or not the government is planning an acreage deficiency program for 1987 somewhat similar to what we had for 1986. I have asked this question a number of times, but, as yet, I have not had an answer to it.

There are some people who believe that tomorrow may be the last day that we will have to ask questions and to receive answers. Therefore, I ask him if he would give me an undertaking now that he will answer that question before we adjourn for the summer, which event may happen tomorrow.

Senator Flynn: You will be back in the fall.

Senator Olson: The farmers want to know now. They do not want to wait and suffer all the anxiety that goes with that. I am sorry that Senator Flynn does not understand that. There are a lot of farmers in western Canada who are having a very difficult time economically.

Senator Flynn: We know that very well.

Senator Olson: Senator Flynn ought to understand that when problems like this are being discussed he ought to sit and be quiet and listen to some intelligent answers from the leaders in this place. So far I am not receiving them.

Senator Flynn: I am sure the answers will be more intelligent than the question.

Hon. Hazen Argue: Honourable senators, I have a supplementary question to put to the deputy leader on the same general subject Senator Olson raised.

I ask if the Prime Minister and the government are taking into consideration the request by major farm organizations in this country that the deficiency payment this year should be at least three times as big as it has been in order to meet the deficit, and that the payment of something like $800 million to western producers has not, in any way, prevented foreclosures and a very severe downturn in the prairie economy.

I just want to register that I, for one, am not satisfied with a repetition of an inadequate program and I think the government should give consideration to an adequate one.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

FREE TRADE NEGOTIATIONS—CANADIAN AND AMERICAN APPROACHES

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would like the Deputy Leader of the Government to ask—and respond to me at some later date—whether the picture that I now get of free trade negotiations and the constitutional issue responds to the following: When it comes to free trade, we, the Canadians, want arbitration whereas the Americans want arbitrariness. That is, of course, because both sides, both they and we, agree on the common ground for this discussion, which is that we want to have Canada's cake and eat it too, and they also want to have Canada's cake and eat it too.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD—SENATE REFORM

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: As far as the Meech Lake accord is concerned, would the Deputy Leader of the Government agree that I am correct in thinking that hereafter the Triple "E" Senate is possible— meaning, equal, elected and extraneous?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am more inclined to congratulate the honourable senator on his delightful command of the Queen's English rather than on his logic and reasonableness.

I cannot accept any of the premises on which the questions have been based, but I will certainly try to get what information I can.

Senator Gigantès: Thank you.

STATUS OF WOMEN

CANADIAN JOB STRATEGY—AVAILABILITY OF FUNDS

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, on June 12 last the Honourable Barbara McDougall, Minister responsible for the Status of Women, and the Honourable Benoît Bouchard, Minister of Employment and Immigration, announced two changes to the Canadian Job Strategy, both of which are significant for women in this country. They moved the severely employment disadvantaged option from job development to job entry and, in the skill shortages component, non-traditional occupations will be designated to help meet the demand for qualified women.

Both these changes are welcome changes. However, there was no announcement made of any budget change to go with the two adjustments. In other words, it is the estimate of many people that if a significant budget increase is not made, especially in the second change—in the skill shortages component—this will be an absolutely empty and meaningless adjustment.

I wonder if the Deputy Leader of the Government would investigate and find out if there is to be money added to the skill shortages component in particular to make this a useful adjustment for the women of Canada?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I will attempt to get the answer for the honourable senator.

HUMAN RIGHTS

JAPANESE CANADIANS—GOVERNMENT APOLOGY AND COMPENSATION—STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Jerahmiel S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, this month marks the third anniversary of the commitment made by the then Leader of the Opposition and now Prime Minister Mulroney with respect to addressing the issue of an apology and compensation to Canadians of Japanese descent for acts done by the government during World War II and following.

In June 1984 in the run-up to the 1984 federal election campaign, Mr. Mulroney promised that there would be an apology, as a priority. He also promised that there would be individual compensation to those Canadians of Japanese descent who had had inflicted upon them acts of the government which deprived them of their freedom and also their property.

Subsequent to that, the Liberal Party leader, Mr. Turner, committed himself to both those propositions, an apology and a form of partial individual compensation.

Could the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate apprise the Senate whether or not the commitment made by Mr. Mulroney on that date—the third anniversary of which has now passed—has come any closer to fruition, and could he bring us up to date on these long and laborious negotiations that have been carried on episodically since that date?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have no new information on this matter, but I will certainly make inquiries on your behalf.

EMERGENCIES BILL

GOVERNMENT'S INTENTION RE LEGISLATIVE ACTION

Hon. John B. Stewart: Honourable senators, on Friday last the House of Commons gave first reading to a bill, Bill C-77, which will repeal the War Measures Act and replace it with a statute to be called the Emergencies Act.

Could the Leader of the Government in the Senate inform this house whether it is the intention of the government to go forward with this bill at this session so that it becomes law before the end of the session, or will this bill stand over until the next session of Parliament?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I have no knowledge of it coming forward in this session. I have not been instructed or told that it will be coming forward. If I do hear something to that effect, I will certainly bring the information to the chamber.

Senator Stewart: Will the honourable senator do more than that? Will he make inquiries and ascertain what the intentions are?

Senator Doody: I certainly will.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask the Leader of the Government a question having to do with the business of the Senate?

We know that the House of Commons did advance some legislation on Friday which will, presumably, be available to us when deferred votes have been taken. Today the House of Commons is dealing entirely with capital punishment.

What I want to ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate is whether he can assure us that we will not be asked suddenly to deal with new bills on the last day of the session, that is, tomorrow, without having received any advance notice of whichever particular bill may come forward or what might be dealt with on the last day by the House of Commons.

• (1450)

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I really cannot give the honourable senator a guarantee in that regard. Things have not changed much this past year over the previous seven years that I have been here. There are always some surprises awaiting us as we get closer to the end of the session. I have been told that several bills will be coming to the Senate. The bills to which Senator MacEachen just referred as having had their third reading votes deferred will be voted on at 5.45 this afternoon, and I understand that we will receive those tomorrow morning.

There are some other bills which I think might come to the Senate. They do not appear to be overly contentious, although I say that with some trepidation, having sat in another place for some time. People who introduce housekeeping bills usually have an awful lot of other garbage stored in the closets as well.

There is the farm loans bill, which I am told will not cause any problems; there is Bill C-70, respecting workplace hazards; there is Bill C-79, respecting customs tariffs, which has been pre-studied and reported upon; there is Bill C-56, respecting financial institutions, which has also been pre-studied. Bill C-21, respecting shipping conferences, has been pre-studied. I think it will be voted on today. With respect to Bill C-71, which deals with the Deschênes commission, I really cannot give senators any more information than the title. If it is, indeed, a difficult piece of legislation, then the option is open to the Senate to deal with it as it will. Bill C-42, respecting financial institutions and the deposit insurance system, will be dealt with today in the other place. We will receive it in the morning. Bill C-63, which deals with the Small Businesses Loans Act and the Fisheries Improvement Loan Board, is not, I am told, a contentious bill.

To the best of my knowledge, honourable senators, those are the bills that we can anticipate for tomorrow. I do not really have any problems with them. Those are possibly famous last words, but there they are.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I do not think I caught the meaning of the honourable senator when he said, "I don't foresee any problems." Did I catch the expression properly?

Senator Doody: Yes. Being a naive and simple gentleman, I really see no great difficulty that the Senate could run into with these particular bills. As I said, however, those could very well be famous last words in that they will live to haunt me forever. There may well be areas that will cause concern, but I have been led to believe that that is not so.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, I believe that for the first time the government has mentioned the possibility that Bill C-71 will come to the Senate. That is the bill affecting war criminals. It has not received second reading in the House of Commons. I hope that the Leader of the Government exempted that bill when he said that he did not foresee any problems, because this is a new bill, from our point of view, and we would have to examine it most carefully. If it does receive treatment in the Commons, the word is that a number of government members would find it offensive, indeed, to have the bill go through all its stages without study in committee. Obviously it will be up to the Senate to decide whether it wants to pass a bill of that significance in all its stages in the last hour or two that the Senate sits. I simply emphasize that this is the first time, to my knowledge, that mention has been made of Bill C-71 as a possible candidate for legislation that will be passed in all its stages in the Senate before the end of the session.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators will note that I, too, referred to that bill specifically. Obviously we will have to examine it when it gets here. As I said, I know nothing about it other than its title. The Senate will examine it if it gets here—it may not.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

POSTAL STRIKE—APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Deputy Leader of the Government in the Senate. In today's Toronto Star, referring to the appointment of a mediator in the postal dispute, it states:

McGarry told reporters yesterday he will continue to call selective strike actions unless it is clear that a pause will contribute to a settlement.

He emphasized the union is not prepared to make any significant concessions on the key issues—job security and increased workloads for individual carriers.

Canada Post Vice-President André Villeneuve said the corporation remains firm in its pursuit of greater flexibility and productivity.

The article also states:

But the labour minister said circumstances had changed and Kelly's mediation could be beneficial.

Could the deputy leader tell me what circumstances have changed?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I am not prepared to comment on that, but I will attempt to get an answer for Senator Turner.

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD, 1987

SPECIAL JOINT COMMITTEE—COMMONS MEMBERS

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that the following message had been received from the House of Commons:

HOUSE OF COMMONS
CANADA

Friday, June 26, 1987

ORDERED,—That a Message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that the names of Mrs. Blais-Grenier, Messrs. Cooper, Daubney, Duguay, Friesen, Hamelin, Ms. Jewett, Messrs. Kaplan, Nystrom, O'Neil, Ouellet and Speyer have been appointed to serve on the Special Joint Committee on the 1987 Constitutional Accord.

MICHAEL B. KIRBY

*for the Clerk of the House of CommonsMOTOR VEHICLE TRANSPORT BILL, 1987

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), seconded by the Honourable Senator Robertson, for the second reading of the Bill C-19, An Act respecting motor vehicle transport by extra-provincial undertakings.—(Honourable Senator Turner).

Hon. Charles Turner: Honourable senators, Bill C-19, the Motor Vehicle Transport Bill, 1987, replaces the Motor Vehicle Transportation Act, 1953-54, which will be repealed.

Bill C-19 introduced the new criterion upon which to base the granting of a licence for the operation of a truck undertaking. This new criterion is to be "fit, willing and able." If an undertaking applying for an extra-provincial licence is fit, willing and able, it will be granted a licence unless a person objects and can bring to the provincial transport board evidence to the contrary. The holder of the licence must also comply with safety standards and have proper insurance and bonding coverage. Only then will a public hearing be held. The person objecting must prove, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that, first, the applicant is not fit to operate a truck undertaking or is unwilling or unable to operate the undertaking or, second, that any of the following consequences may result from the operation of the truck undertaking.

This new market entry criterion is part of the deregulation policy of the present government. The objective is to ease the entry of truck undertakings into the market and, therefore, to increase competition within the Canadian trucking industry. It replaces the criteria presently in place that are known as "public convenience and necessity." Under this transport regulation a trucking firm must show that its application for a licence will result in a necessary service to the Canadian public and will increase the convenience provided to the public. This measure limits market entry only to those trucking operations that will add a necessary service.

Once this act has been in place for three years, all restrictions and conditions will cease to have effect, with the exception of a compliance to safety standards and the holding of proper insurance and bonding coverage. In other words, this new criterion will not come into force until three years after the enactment of this bill. Intra-provincial truck undertakings will require not only a local licence but also an extra-provincial truck undertaking licence. The fit, willing and able criteria will not apply to extra-provincial bus transport. That will be governed in the way it has always been, namely, within the provincial Transport Board's discretion.

● (1500)

Constitutionally, jurisdiction over trucking is divided between the federal and provincial governments, but federal economic regulatory responsibilities have been delegated to the provinces since the passage of the Motor Vehicle Transport Act in 1954.

Over the past 30 years the for-hire trucking industry has experienced substantial growth. For-hire trucking now generates from $6 billion to $6.5 billion annually in revenues. With the 1980 U.S. deregulation of the trucking industry, there was pressure on the Canadian government to ease the burden of regulation. By February 1985 a federal-provincial accord was concluded, setting out a framework for deregulation. The essential points of the Memorandum of Understanding are, first, the shifting of the burden of proof for an extra-provincial operating authority from the applicant to the objector; second, the elimination of the requirement for the approval of the motor carrier rates and charges; third, the exemption of the transportation of certain commodities from economic regulation; and, fourth, streamlining the application process.

Bill C-19 proposes to review the MVTA to reflect the conditions of the 1985 federal-provincial accord. The Minister of Transport proposed to change the entry criterion from a test of "public convenience and necessity" to a "fit, willing and able" requirement. In the future, an application for a carrier's licence will be approved unless an objector can show that the proposed service is contrary to "public convenience and necessity"—the reverse onus test. The other change proposed by the Minister of Transport is to remove the control of rates and fares.

The amendments to the MVTA will have a great impact on the Canadian trucking industry. The Canadian industry can expect strong competition from American trucking companies for the trans-border traffic and from the railways for the long-haul traffic. The possible result of these pressures could be a trend to consolidation.

Following the U.S. Motor Carrier Act of 1980, there was significant restructuring of the United States trucking industry. By 1982 approximately 350 firms, with over 87,000 employees, went out of business. Concentration has increased as the top ten carriers increased their aggregate market from 38 per cent to 48 per cent by 1982. Labour has experienced pressure for lower wage settlements. Some observers maintain that U.S. trucking deregulation caused final desperation in firms which compromised safety expenditures.

The federal government has provided financial assistance to the Atlantic provinces throughout the 1970s and 1980s for upgrading and new highway development. The objectives of these cost-shared highway programs were to increase socio-economic opportunities in Atlantic Canada, to enhance the national primary highway network, to permit the adoption of specified uniform truck load weights and vehicle configurations, and to improve safety for trucking and the travelling public.

Because highway upgrading is expensive and places a heavy financial burden on the provinces in Atlantic Canada, the federal government became involved in an effort to eliminate regional disparities and to provide some national standards. From 1977 to 1980 Transport Canada was committed to a $200 million program shared 50-50. From 1981 to 1985 Transport Canada was committed to a second phase expenditure of $168 million, again shared 50-50.

There is no less a demand for highway improvement in Atlantic Canada and in other parts of Canada. However, there is no reference made by the Minister of Transport, in his development of a new national transportation policy, with regard to highway assistance for those regions.

Honourable senators, I sincerely believe that the following questions have to be placed before the government: First, the trucking industry in Canada stands to lose significantly in the trans-border traffic with the United States. What measures should be taken to ensure that a Canadian trucking industry survives, and that concentration does not result in fewer companies offering less competition? Second, in the federal-provincial negotiations regarding transportation, what proposals does the Minister of Transport have with regard to highway improvement funding? Will the funding for highway improvement from the federal government be terminated, and what are the regional implications of such a decision?

Deregulation of the Canadian trucking industry will mean free trade in trucking, and will be most advantageous to the U.S. trucking firms. While it is true that Canadian carriers have had relatively easy access to trans-border trucking operations between Canada and points in the United States since the U.S. Motor Carrier Act of 1980, the Canadian carriers have not had easy access to intra-state routes, which are still highly regulated in 43 of the 50 states. Moreover, Canadian carriers, who have penetrated deeply into the United States with Canadian export products, have frequently had to return empty to Canada because immigration laws deny them the right to carry U.S. domestic traffic in Canadian registered equipment and utilizing Canadian drivers.

Here in Canada deregulation at the national level is being accompanied by parallel deregulation at the provincial level to produce a total deregulation package. These packages are scheduled to go into effect on January 1, 1988. Deregulation will, therefore, provide U.S. trucking firms with easy access to both trans-border and intra-provincial operating authorities within Canada.

Although the United States trucker must contend in Canada with immigration laws which prohibit the utilization of foreign-based equipment and foreign drivers for domestic traffic movements, this does not pose the same logistical problem for him as it does for the Canadian carrier who is penetrating deeply into the United States market. A southern U.S. trucker, who has entered Canada with a shipment from Texas and is unable to obtain a back-haul from a Canadian point, is but a couple of hours from the United States border, and has an extensive U.S. market from which to draw.

Trucking is the dominant mode of transport for Canadian exports to the United States. Based on 1984 statistics, the total annual value of exports transported by road to the United States approaches $50 billion. This accounts for about 53 per cent of the value of all exports to the United States. The international revenues for Canadian carriers account for about 12.5 per cent of total operating revenues. These figures clearly demonstrate that the trans-border trucking market is of major importance to Canadian carriers.

In recent years there has been a balance in the participation in the trans-border trucking market between Canadian carriers, on the one hand, and United States carriers, on the other. While Canadian truckers have had an edge on U.S. carriers in terms of the number of trips, research studies have shown that the value of U.S. shipments were somewhat higher and that, as a result, the U.S. trans-border trucking operator earned a higher revenue per kilometre than the Canadian carrier.

Deregulation in the United States has shown that there is increasing market concentration in the less than truckload sector. The share of the market controlled by the major U.S. firms Yellow, Roadway and Consolidated Freightways has risen from less than 20 per cent in 1979—a year before deregulation—to more than 30 per cent by 1987. Based on Australia's experience, which was deregulated in 1953, those three companies will come to control some 60 per cent to 70 per cent of the market within the next decade.

● (1510)

What are the possible consequences for Canadians, you might ask. Each of those U.S. companies is three to five times the size of the very largest Canadian trucking firms, such as CP, TNT, Route Canada, Kingsway, Reimer, Motorways and Glengarry. If, then, there is to be substantial market concentration in Canada over the next ten to fifteen years with three or four carriers dominating the market, which three or four will it be? The U.S. giants or the Canadian giants? What implications does this have for Canadian jobs and the Canadian gross national product? These are things which seem to require instant investigation. I do not in any way mean to suggest that Canadian trucking firms are not competitive. They are both hardy and resilient competitors. But the playing field as between the U.S. carriers and Canadian carriers has not been evened up as yet. Until such time as appropriate tax reform has been implemented in Canada, Canadian truckers will pay higher taxes than their U.S. competitors. This means lower profit margins and less financial reserves with which to ride out the price wars which will take place. It appears to me that this body should ensure that all the relevant social and economic implications have been thoroughly considered before Bill C-19 is enacted into law.

There has been some debate in recent months as to whether or not a linkage between trucking deregulation and deterioration in highway safety has been adequately proven. Some statistics and studies suggest a linkage while others do not. It may be several years before there are sufficient reliable statistics from which to draw solid conclusions. Until such time as we, the legislators, are in possession of such dependable research findings, we have to err on the side of the presumption that there is a link, a definite link. Thus, then, we have to pay some attention to those statistics and reports from such places as California, New York State, Florida, Arizona and Australia, which suggest a linkage between deregulation and/or deterioration in safety.

A 1986 U.S. study involving 100,000 interviews and conducted by Transportation Research and Marketing in conjunction with the Commercial Vehicle Safety Alliance produced some disturbing findings, first, the average speed of trucks increased sharply, following deregulation, from 60 miles per hour in the 1977-to-1979 period to about 65 miles per hour in the 1983-to-1986 period. Second, the average age of equipment rose from 3.5 years in the initial period to 5.2 years in 1986. Third, in the pre-deregulation period, only 3.7 per cent of truck drivers were operating in excess of 15 hours per day. In the post-deregulation period, this number climbed to some 8 per cent. Fourth, during 1985 and 1986 California, which had deregulated in 1980, inquired into its safety experience and found that its accident rate had shot up, that the workers' compensation rate for trucking employees had increased by 44 per cent between 1978 and 1985, that the California industry was spending 10 per cent less on vehicle maintenance and repair, even though their truck fleets were older, and that support of the trucking industry for the Certified Practising Safety Administrator Program and the Annual Safety Congress had dropped by 83 per cent and 49 per cent respectively.

The foregoing data and statistical information suggests that we in Canada will want to have at the outset of deregulation a comprehensive set of safety regulations covering the driver, the vehicle and the hours of service. Moreover, these regulations must be enforced in a businesslike way.

Honourable senators, the Minister of Transport, the Honourable John Crosbie, has indicated that the National Safety Code, which was agreed to by the provinces and the federal government this past March, covers these needs. He has pointed out, however, that the code is to be phased in between 1988 and 1990. That certainly raises the question as to whether the safeguards which will be in place as of January 1, 1988—the effective date of deregulation—will meet the need, or will such programs, such as those governing hours of service, still be months away from implementation in several Canadian provinces? In the competitive struggle which will rage as of January 1, 1988, will some less responsible trucking operators attempt to secure their market position by running their drivers excessively long hours, with its driver fatigue and accident implications? We cannot leave this to chance. We must act now. The Government of Canada must either take the steps necessary to ensure that legislation, regulation and enforcement covering the driver, the vehicle and the hours of service are in place by January 1, 1988, or it must reserve unto itself the responsibility to proclaim into effect the trucking regulation bill, Bill C-19, when the safety programs are ready on all fronts.

This could be handled with but a very minor change to Bill C-19 by amending clause 29(1) to read as follows:

This Act, except section 24, shall come into force on a day to be fixed by proclamation.

Honourable senators, like thousands of trucking company employees, air line company employees and railway company employees, I am convinced that Bills C-18, C-19 and C-22 are part and parcel of the free trade issue.

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: I must remind honourable senators that if the honourable Senator MacDonald speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on second reading.

Senator MacDonald: Honourable senators, I wish to congratulate Senator Turner on his exposition of a very important bill. I can tell Senator Turner that I wish that we had been given the opportunity to spend some time on this bill, to have pre-studied it over the last several months, to raise a number of these issues, and without dealing with it at this late hour.

I do not think that the honourable senator raised any serious objections in his comments about the market entry criteria. I believe he referred to the reverse onus theory, but I did not note that he had come to any particular conclusions. It is pretty obvious that the idea is to increase competition within the national safety standards. For example, if a trucker is licensed in the province of Ontario through the Ontario Highway Safety Act, or whatever they call it, he is presumed to be able to go before the Public Utilities Board in Nova Scotia and, generally speaking, receive a licence to operate in that province, because he has met the standards of Ontario with regard to fitness and safety. However, as the honourable senator pointed out, there is opportunity for a complainant to object on a number of grounds as to why this person should not be given a licence in Nova Scotia. He might object on competitive grounds, if the applicant has no intention, for whatever reason, of taking on certain routes. The honourable senator said that that opportunity would exist for three years. I believe it is three years, and that the bill extends the period to five years, but I am not sure. In any event, after that period, the opportunity for objection on other grounds would be eliminated.

● (1520)

The references made to safety require special attention. Canada has had, of course, an enviable safety record. The purpose of Bill C-19 is to ensure that the elements of the new safety code are going to be in place by the time designated, even though they are already in place in several provinces.

I do not want to repeat what I said when I moved second reading as to what the National Safety Code requires, but I do not know whether that is particularly germane to this bill. It has been said by some—and I do not necessarily want to be included among them—that safety is a matter of provincial responsibility. They are making the provinces a bit of a scapegoat; it is an excuse by the trucking firms who are opposed to the regulatory reform suggested here. They say that the full enforcement of the safety code is a matter for the provinces. Matters such as training, licensing and road inspections are under their jurisdiction. Ottawa cannot do it unilaterally. However, in the final analysis, Senator Turner, there is no link between economic regulatory reform and safety.

There are many trucks on the road now, and a new safety code is important, with or without Bill C-19. Bill C-19 will not cause more accidents. Indeed, Bill C-19 will help the prevention of accidents, because we will be able to pass regulations for national safety standards. The references you made to driver fatigue and matters of hours behind the wheel—things which a province cannot, for obvious reasons, enforce—are, of course, to come under a special section of the regulations to be promulgated to ensure that such things will be minimized or eliminated entirely.

You referred to the United States competition. As I understand it, it is quite easy to get a licence to operate in one of the American states through the inter-federal agency. We have not had too much difficulty there.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Ask the Yukon.

Senator MacDonald: There is, of course, a clear section, Senator Gigantès, in Bill C-19 which was an amendment made in the other place. It gives Canada an opportunity to reciprocate against American truckers in this country, if there is a reason for doing so, but we hope that this countervail is never going to be required.

Senator Gigantès: Will the senator entertain a question?

Senator MacDonald: Yes, by all means.

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, it is much easier for a large partner in a dispute, with whom the smaller has 80 per cent of its trade, to be bullying than it is for the smaller partner to be bullying. It will be a lot harder for us to get any redress from the colossus to the south, especially if they are not accepting arbitration instead of the current arbitrariness, which was the point of a question I asked during Question Period.

Senator MacDonald: Senator, I will be delighted to pass those words of caution on to the minister.

I will not draw this out, but there is, of course, Senator Turner, reference to the amounts of money which are going to be made available to the provinces to assist them with respect to assimilation of a new safety code, and they all agreed to that some eight months ago.

I do not have too much to add to the excellent remarks that you have made. We are not here to reinvent the wheel, if not the railway. We are no longer in the business of building railways.

Senator Turner: Who says so?

Senator MacDonald: We are in the business of extracting resources and processing and manufacturing and selling goods. That is what modern transportation is all about.

[Senator MacDonald.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to ask Senator MacDonald a question. At the beginning of his remarks, in congratulating Senator Turner on his intervention on Bill C-19, Senator MacDonald said that it was too bad that we would not have an opportunity to study this bill and look into some of these questions, as we would have had if we had done a pre-study. Do I understand that it is his position—and I assume if he speaks he speaks for the government—that if we do not take our chance at a pre-study, then, sorry, folks, you are not going to get a chance to study the bill? I did not understand the relevance of saying it is too bad that we cannot study the bill and how interesting it would have been to study the bill, but we cannot do that now, because we did not have a pre-study.

Is he going to move that the bill go to the committee after second reading?

Senator MacDonald: I am not going to do any such thing.

Senator Frith: Oh, you are not?

Senator MacDonald: I said it was unfortunate that we did not have an opportunity to pre-study Bills C-18 and C-19. We received these bills for pre-study two weeks ago.

Senator Frith: For pre-study?

Senator MacDonald: For pre-study, yes.

Senator Frith: We do not receive bills for pre-study.

Senator MacDonald: They were referred to us for pre-study some time within the last two weeks. Does that answer your question?

Senator Frith: Yes. You mean that we referred them to the committee for pre-study.

Senator MacDonald: That is correct, some two weeks ago. I said it was regrettable that our committee did not have an opportunity to pre-study these bills several months ago.

Senator Frith: Therefore, unless the Senate pre-studies a bill, it does not get a chance to send it to a committee?

Senator MacDonald: I said that it would have been extraordinarily helpful if the Transport Committee, some months ago, could have heard and taken into consideration the excellent remarks made by Senator Turner instead of hearing them today for the first time.

Senator Frith: What is to prevent the committee hearing them now when you send it to them?

Senator MacDonald: You can speak to Bill C-19 right now, Senator Frith. I would be delighted to hear your comments.

Senator Frith: No, that is not what I am doing. Perhaps Senator MacDonald still does not understand the implication of what he said. The two things we have put together now is: It is too bad we did not have the chance to hear these comments on a pre-study of this bill. Then, when I asked him if he is going to move that the bill be referred to the committee for study, as is usual after second reading, he said, no, that he is not going to.

I take it his position is that because we did not pre-study the bill, it should not go to the committee now for study.

Senator MacDonald: My position, Senator Frith, is quite clear. I consider that this bill has received an enormous amount of attention by the Transport Committee in the other house.

Senator Frith: So, we should not bother with it now.

Senator MacDonald: They have travelled the country extensively. All the provinces have been involved. Amendments have been considered. Hundreds of witnesses have been heard.

I have acquainted myself as best I can with the bill, and I am quite confident that it is a good bill. I have no intention of referring it to committee. However, be my guest.

Senator Frith: So now we have a third branch of the MacDonald formula, namely, pre-study the bill, and if you do not then there is no reason to send it to a committee of the Senate, especially if the House of Commons has done what he thinks is a good job. What are we here for? Are we here to pre-study bills or are we here to have our committee study bills, even if some senators might think that the House of Commons did a good job? Is that the formula now?

Senator MacDonald: Perish the thought that I should suggest, Senator Frith, that we should rubber stamp a bill from the other place. Perish the thought that I should ever make that kind of a suggestion.

Senator Frith: That is not what I am asking. I am asking: Why is he not moving that it go to the committee as it usually does?

Senator MacDonald: I would like Senator Frith, in the absence of his leader, to explain the strange, new policy which has caused committees to be idle when they could be pre-studying legislation. We have had examples of it, and you know what they are. You can explain whether there is something new going on that would deny us the opportunity for pre-study. You might explain.

● (1530)

Senator Frith: I will be glad to explain it!

Senator MacDonald: Well, do it now!

Senator Frith: Yes. Senator MacDonald is talking about a so-called new policy in which we do not always pre-study a bill simply because there is a request for such a pre-study.

Senator MacDonald: Right!

Senator Frith: What is new is to suggest that it is normal for us to pre-study a bill. The normal legislative process is for a bill starting in the House of Commons to be studied in the House of Commons, according to their rules, to come here, to be given first reading, to be given second reading, on the basis of principle, and then to be referred to a committee for study. That is the usual process; that is not new. So there is nothing new about saying that committees should not automatically pre-study. But there is certainly something brand new in the suggestion that if they did not then the mover of the bill will not send it to the committee, and the committees will be told, "Sorry, you had your chance to pre-study." Well, pre-study is an exceptional and special procedure.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: It is not an ordinary procedure. There is nothing new for me to explain. What is going on here is that I am trying to get Senator MacDonald to explain his new concept, namely, that "Sorry, folks, you did not pre-study it, so, of course, I will not refer it." I take it that Senator Macquarrie will do the same thing with Bill C-18; he will not move reference to the committee.

Senator MacDonald: Senator Frith, if you wish to refer this to a committee for study, I—

Senator Frith: That is not the point.

Senator MacDonald: —would never object in the world! I think it would be a splendid idea.

Senator Frith: You do?

Senator MacDonald: By all means; you refer it to the committee, and I will be there.

Senator Frith: Senator MacDonald still does not understand. He has been here quite a while.

Senator Flynn: You do not understand his answer, either.

Senator Frith: No, I understand his answer perfectly.

Senator Flynn: He said, "move it!"

Senator Frith: I hear it. I understand his answer perfectly, Senator Flynn. You have been here long enough to know that the normal thing is not for the opposition to move that.

Senator Flynn: But the point is that he said, "If you want to move it, move it!"

Senator Frith: I heard that. Thank you very much, I am perfectly capable of hearing that.

Senator Flynn: I do not want to argue with you or anyone else.

Senator Frith: Senator MacDonald, do you need Senator Flynn to act for you?

Senator MacDonald: No.

Senator Flynn: Can I talk—

Senator Frith: Sorry, but can I see Senator MacDonald behind you there? Thank you. There he is now; I see him again. His frontman has got out of the way, and I can now see the real Senator MacDonald back there.

Let us get something clear: The normal rule is for the sponsor of a bill to move reference to a committee for study after second reading. It is not normal for the mover to stand up and say, "Oh, please, I would be happy if you do."

Senator Flynn: It has been done over and over again.

Senator Frith: I am asking Senator MacDonald if this is what he calls regular or irregular. I say that it is irregular for the sponsor of a bill, after it gets second reading, not to refer it to committee, if requested. It is the sponsor who moves it, not the opposition.

Senator Flynn: Why not?

Senator Frith: I take it, in this case, that the government is saying, "We will not send this bill."

Senator MacDonald: No, no, I say request it.

Senator Frith: We are saying that you will not follow the usual process and move that it be referred after second reading.

Senator Flynn: You are caught now!

Senator Frith: Is that right?

Senator Flynn: You are caught!

Senator Frith: Caught?

Senator MacDonald: Repeat the question.

Senator Frith: Now Senator Doody will answer.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, perhaps I may, with some trepidation, enter myself into this altercation.

The history of Bills C-18 and C-19 is well known to everyone here. This is not an ordinary situation—and Senator Frith, I think, knows it as well as most of the rest of us do.

This bill first saw the light of day in the other place a year or more ago as Bill C-5. It had a stormy passage in the House of Commons at that time and was subsequently re-entered as Bills C-18 and C-19.

Prior to last Christmas, I first approached the other side with a suggestion that we take these bills for pre-study. I said that—and once again I was not saying something new or startling—this was a complicated measure which would create a lot of attention and would need a lot of attention by the Senate. The honourable senators opposite were not of a mind to take the bills for pre-study.

Several times during the past months, subsequent to that initial try back in December, I approached with the same message: "Please, let us get these bills into pre-study." At that particular time, as I remember, the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications was not all that busy—other committees were a great deal busier—and I suggested that it might be helpful, as we got closer to the end of the sitting year, that these bills be pre-studied. There is nothing unusual about that; that has been done many times with other bills when honourable gentlemen and ladies opposite were on this side and we were over there. These bills—

Senator Frith: I have never asked the opposition to move a reference to a committee.

Senator Doody: —were taken.

Senator Frith: Never, never!

Senator Doody: Since the opposition was reluctant to—

Senator Frith: You look it up.

Senator Flynn: I have done it myself.

[Senator Frith.]

Senator Doody: —cooperate in that particular request for pre-study, it seems that they were accepting the fact that the bill was being studied elsewhere, the work was being done elsewhere and there was no need to do it. Now we come to the eleventh hour—the candle is growing short—and honourable senators feel that the bill should go to committee.

Well, as Senator MacDonald says, "If the bill has to go to committee, so be it." I would have liked to see it there six or eight months ago, but it was not to be. If honourable senators now wish to send it to committee then we on this side will certainly cooperate with the committee in any way that we can and help with the study.

As Senator MacDonald has said, it has been studied. The House of Commons committee has travelled from coast to coast. There have been numerous hearings and volumes of information has been gathered. The result of all of this is in this bill that is before us. The situation is as I have said. If the Senate wishes this bill—or both of these bills—to go to committee then the Senate has every right to send them to committee, but I do not think that it would be fair to the government or to the sponsors of this bill for us to send it to committee again at this time.

Senator Frith: Well, honourable senators, this is not the first time that this explanation has been given. Senator MacEachen has made it clear that the normal legislative process is not pre-study. I think that it is unreasonable to set up the situation that we are in now on the basis of a study having been made in the other place and on the basis of pre-study having been requested.

I do not know what Senator Doody means by saying that "the Transport Committee was not all that busy." The fact is that it was sitting regularly on other matters; it was not sitting twiddling its thumbs.

The principle that we are talking about here, then—taking the actual case before us of Bill C-19—is that Bill C-19 was passed by the House of Commons on June 25. I am underlining the precedent that we must avoid creating here as being undesirable. That is, when a bill is passed in the other place on June 25—which is less than a week ago—and then comes here, and the reason for not referring it to our committee as a matter of course by the sponsor of the bill is (a) because the other place studied it; and (b) because the government asked for a pre-study of the bill—it should be made clear that those are not reasons to not follow the normal course.

For one thing, if there was such an all-fired, extensive study in the other place, it is reasonable that our committee would like to, at least, get a chance to look at those proceedings and understand what study was made in the other place as well as to read the reports. But the implication is that the role of the Senate is to pass a bill at second reading and not refer it to a committee—even though the bill was passed only a week earlier and hung around the other place all that time—and the Senate will not be expected to study a bill in its committee if: (a) there has been extensive study on the other side; and (b) there has been a request for pre-study. I think that that is unreasonable, and I do not see that as the role of the Senate at all.

Senator Doody: It is not an implication, honourable senators, it is a fact. If this bill had suddenly appeared out of nowhere last week and passed all stages in the House of Commons, and then came up here—

Senator Frith: For us it appeared suddenly last week.

Senator Doody: —and we were expecting it to be passed quickly, then that is one thing. But this is a different situation. This bill has been on the Order Paper in the other place for—

Senator Frith: So what?

Senator Doody: —months and months and months.

Senator Frith: So what? It was not on our order paper.

Senator Doody: —and the studies, the Hansard of the other place and the reports have been available. Honourable senators were aware of how big the bill is.

Senator Frith: Are we supposed to read all the debates of the other place as well as doing our own work?

Senator Doody: The honourable senators who were asked to pre-study the bill were made aware of the fact that there was going to be a problem. Now we have a problem and I am asking honourable senators to resolve it.

● (1540)

Senator Frith: What is the problem?

Senator MacDonald: We have another interesting situation where we have a bill, which will likely be passed this evening, Bill C-21, which deals with the exemption from the Competition Act.

Senator Frith: Our committee has studied that.

Senator MacDonald: We will present the report tomorrow morning. There have already been nine weeks of productive work by our committee. It will be interesting to see whether you want that to be referred to committee again.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, to prevent the "MacDonald formula" from becoming a precedent around here, I will move—although he should be putting the motion—that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. I do that so that we do not, in this case—or in the next case, which I will also speak to—show that kind of contempt for our committees.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

An Hon. Senator: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division, and bill referred to Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION BILL, 1987

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Macquarrie, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), for the second reading of the Bill C-18, An Act respecting national transportation.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have little to add about Bill C-18's 184 pages and 369 clauses.

I cannot believe that in this case the government will suggest that we take this bill, passed in the House of Commons just on June 17, and again show such contempt for our committees as to say that our committee has missed its opportunity to study this bill. I hope the government does not take the attitude that since we had an opportunity to pre-study the bill, and decided not to do so because we were busy with other things, or for some other good reason, we will not be given an opportunity to do so now. Incidentally, there was no warning that if we did not pre-study the bill that when the bill was passed by the House of Commons, no matter how long it took the House of Commons to pass it or how many amendments might be proposed, we would be asked to forgo our opportunity to study the bill at all.

Honourable senators, my comments may be unnecessary, because it may be that Senator Macquarrie is going to move that the bill be referred to committee.

I have nothing further to add, if Senator Macquarrie wishes to close the debate.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Macquarrie speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Hon. Heath Macquarrie: Honourable senators, I am always stirred by the ominous formula of that warning. Of course, I have listened with intense care to the exchanges that came out of the discussion of Bill C-19. I am always amused at some of the routines of this place. It seems strange that we deal with Bill C-19 and then we are asked to deal with Bill C-18. It seems to me that pure mathematics would dictate that it should be the other way around. Had that been the case, I might have been the target for some of the sharp remarks that were passed to Senator MacDonald.

I congratulate Senator Turner on his excellent, thorough participation the other day. I regret that I was unable to hear him. I had to be in the cradle of Confederation because of a long-standing commitment, otherwise, I would have been here. He obviously knows the field very well and cares deeply. He has produced a comprehensive comment on a very important matter, and I thank him for it.

Honourable senators, I have nothing more to say but to thank all senators for their kind attention to this important piece of legislation, which I commend to all my colleagues.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Senator Macquarrie, again, is not, I take it, going to make this motion, and apparently supports the philosophy behind the proposal respecting Bill C-19, which is, as I understand it, that legislation is not normally to be dealt with consecutively but that we should be paying attention to what goes on in the other place so that, in effect, we are operating simultaneously. The philosophy seems also to be that in every case where a Senate committee does not pre-study a bill, this house will be told that it cannot expect it to be studied in due course. That is the corollary to what we are finding here today. Imagine asking the Senate to pass a bill this large on the basis of what was done in the other place. What do we need a Senate for if we are going to operate on the basis of what was done in the other place?

We are supposed to attend to our own business and, as Senator Doody says, read the Hansard of the other place and decide if they have done our jobs for us or not.

Again, it is up to the opposition, it seems, to have the Senate do what it is supposed to do and have the committee deal with this bill which was passed only on June 17 in the other place. The government is asking us to pass this bill without sending it to committee. In order that the committee can do the work it ought to do and that the Senate can do the work it ought to do, and not rely on the House of Commons, I move that this bill be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes.

An Hon. Senator: On division.

Motion agreed to, on division, and bill referred to Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications.

CRIMINAL CODE CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bielish, for the second reading of the Bill C-15, An Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act.—(Honourable Senator Neiman).

[Senator Macquarrie.]

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, I yield to Senator Fairbairn.

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, it is with a mixed sense of relief and great concern that I support second reading of Bill C-15, which contains amendments to the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act on the question of sexual abuse of children. I am relieved because, for the first time in our history, young witnesses may have a fair chance under our system of justice to tell their story in court. I am concerned because the startling increase in reported cases of child sexual abuse in Canada makes the implementation of this bill especially urgent.

Last week, in moving second reading of Bill C-15, Senator Nurgitz noted statistics which tell us that 50 per cent of all the women and 33 per cent of all the men in Canada have, at one point in their lives, been victims of unwanted sexual interference.

In 80 per cent of those cases the interference or abuse took place when they were children.

The Minister of Justice, Ray Hnatyshyn, told our committee that in the last two or three years there has been an increase of somewhere between 25 and 50 per cent in the number of reported cases of child sexual abuse in Canada. Part of the reason is because the subject is no longer completely taboo in our more open society of the 1980s, and part of it is because of efforts at education and communication by which we encourage young people themselves to resist the understandable tendency to remain silent and to come forward with their evidence. If our children, honourable senators, are to have the courage to speak out, we must make it possible for them to be treated with fairness and understanding in a system which is basically constructed for the needs of adults. Bill C-15 makes a substantial effort to do this, and I urge its passage in this house.

• (1550)

Our committee has been studying this bill since last November. It has been a troubling and agonizing educational experience for all of us because of the outstanding number of witnesses who took the time to present their points of view before the committee. We have heard strong representations from experts and advocates on behalf of children. We have also heard compelling evidence for placing a greater focus on treating the offender rather than backing off because of the nature of the crime. Legal experts have expressed concern about the erosion of the traditional rights of the accused, such as the curtailment of the need for corroboration in these cases.

As so often happens in our justice system, when you probe behind the cold, dry words of the law, you find a social issue of immense importance, in addition to the criminal offence.

Bill C-15 has led us, in Parliament, to the very darkest side of our society. This bill is in response to demands for change following the report of the Badgely committee on sexual offences against children and youth and that of the Fraser committee of a few years ago on pornography and prostitution.

As a result of these pressures, we have been confronted with the reality of the deepest, darkest secret a child can endure, and one of the most heinous indignities an adult can perpetrate against a child. It is a chilling fact that a vast majority of those who abuse children sexually are not strangers on the street or shadows in a park—they are people the child knows, people who are in a position of authority, trust, respect, and even love. They are natural parents, step-parents, common-law spouses, guardians, brothers, sisters, relatives, babysitters, doctors, school teachers, close family friends, sports and recreation counsellors, church leaders—indeed, the whole routine of contacts in a child's life.

Dr. Laura Mills from the Winnipeg Children's Hospital Child Protection Centre told us that their statistics and those of other similar centres indicate that 85 per cent of the offenders fall into this category of authority or trust.

They are outwardly normal individuals who, for a variety of physical and psychological reasons, have an inner sexual drive towards children that they cannot control themselves. Indeed, it controls them, and because they are close to the victim, they entrap the child in a secret world of fear and guilt which is far more destructive than an attack by a stranger on the street.

Even when this kind of offender is convicted, the child carries those feelings of guilt and despair far beyond the courtroom. For those children it is truly a life-time sentence.

Some of the most important testimony we heard came from a courageous group of young people from the National Youth-in-Care-Network, which represents young people between the ages of 14 and 24 who are or have been raised in the care of child welfare authorities. All of our witnesses had been sexually abused. They are living away from their families now, some before the courts, others in counselling. And then there were those who could not face the ordeal of the courts and are now left to come to terms with the fact that the offender is free to repeat this abuse with some other child.

I would like to convey to you an idea of the reality which lies behind this bill through the words of one of those young girls:

There are things going on in the world that not all of us can understand— what goes on in a parent's mind while they are sexually abusing their child, or find out that their child has been abused by a person close to the family. The parent or family friend is a sick person, but think of the children, the abused children who trust their abuser, and then the trust is broken and the child's insides are destroyed. Bringing out the secret was the hardest thing I ever had to do . . .

she told us.

Honourable senators, what this bill tries to do is to establish greater equality under the law for these children. By just being children they are, as one witness put it, at the bottom of the heap in terms of power or strength or credibility in an adult world. Throughout their ordeal they have to fight every step of the way to break down the myth that they are not to be believed.

This legislation tells children that they can communicate their story in court without the necessity of corroborating evidence. Judges shall now be able to screen the child, or exclude the child from the courtroom, if necessary, in order to obtain a full and accurate account, rather than the child being intimidated and often silenced by the presence of the accused. This must be done in such a way that the accused, the judge and the jury can watch this testimony by other means, such as closed circuit television, and the accused can communicate with his or her lawyer during this procedure.

Videotaped testimony taken at a reasonable time after the abuse may now be used for the first time in Canada, not just as an investigative tool but also as evidence in court if the child accepts the contents of the videotape while testifying.

As senators will have noted from our committee report on this bill, which was introduced last Friday by the chairman, Senator Neiman, we have recommendations concerning the way these videotapes are made.

We are breaking new ground here, and it is essential that standards be developed for the videotape process if it is to be of use to the child or to the court.

Important decisions must be made on who is best qualified to interview the child, both in terms of understanding how to talk to young children as well as producing a result which will stand up in court as evidence. The techniques of getting the full story from a child while, at the same time, not leading the young witness will require special training for the person or group of people designated for the task. The technical process of the videotaping must also be clearly set out, in terms of the location and use of cameras, so as to produce a true representation of the child telling the story and not a dramatic production or a biased presentation.

As we all know, television is a tremendously powerful medium of communication. In some ways it is more powerful, in terms of the effect on the viewer, than is an actual live appearance. Its value in child abuse cases is twofold: First, in alleviating the pressure on the child to repeat his or her story over and over again throughout the investigative process; and now, with this bill, by assisting child witnesses who may be completely intimidated by the court itself.

• (1600)

We are told that this practice has received mixed reviews in the United States, and, indeed, many prosecutors show a vast preference for having the child give his or her evidence in court without this additional assistance. I believe that the videotape provision could be extremely helpful; but the degree to which it is so will depend on the regulations set down by the provinces, and with any help that is possible from the Department of Justice.

Another assist to the child in this bill is the ability of the judge or the prosecutor to move to restrict publication in any way of information which could disclose the identity of the child. This provision would apply also to the identity of young witnesses under the age of 18.

There was considerable discussion about extending this restriction to the identity of the accused, partly in terms of fairness and also because, in smaller locations particularly, the revelation of the accused could be tantamount to revealing the identity of the child. This concern still exists within our committee, and I believe that this is one aspect which should be carefully considered when the act comes up for review in four years' time.

In addition to these changes in terms of presenting evidence, the bill also goes beyond the sexual assault provisions of the Criminal Code and creates new offences to protect children under 14 from sexual contact, and others between 14 and 18 from exploitation by those in authority or trust. These new offences are, first, sexual interference in terms of touching children under 14 on any part of their body with sexual intent, which could bring a maximum sentence of ten years in prison.

Second, the invitation to sexual touching in which a child under 14 is invited or incited to touch the body of any person, including the person who is inviting the act, and this would also bring a maximum sentence of ten years in prison. Third, sexual exploitation, in terms of touching or invitation to touch, involving a young person between the ages of 14 and 18, by a person in a position of trust or authority or a relationship of dependency. The maximum penalty for this offence would be five years.

Other provisions included in the bill would protect young people from those who would exploit them as prostitutes, either in terms of using their sexual services or by profiting financially from those services. There are sections which deal with sexual exposure to children under 14 years of age, and also provisions dealing with bestiality and anal intercourse involving minors.

I remain concerned about the re-enactment of the offence of vagrancy in this bill, which places a blanket prohibition on a person who has been convicted of a child sexual abuse offence from ever loitering near schoolyards, playgrounds, public parks and bathing areas. I understand that the clause is designed to protect children from a person with intent to offend; but it would be open to abuse by overzealous authorities, and, indeed, it may be unconstitutional. It must be reviewed again over the next four years.

Summing up, in the words of the Minister of Justice who appeared before our committee, the purpose of Bill C-15 is to produce laws that are as effective as possible in protecting the rights of young victims, to ensure that the rights of the accused are protected appropriately, and, when there is a conflict, to ensure that an equitable balance is struck.

The committee heard from witnesses who believed that the bill would diminish the rights of the accused, particularly in terms of false charges levelled in the heat of custody battles when one parent uses the child to allege sexual abuse against another parent. This was clearly troubling members of the committee, members of the bar associations and psychiatric experts who work in the area of assessment and treatment of those accused of sexually abusing children.

It was interesting to re-read the responses to this argument from the young people in care who appeared before the committee. They maintained that falsehoods or exaggerations about sexual abuse from child witnesses would easily be exposed in court. As one of them said: "It is one of the worst things that you can imagine as a child happening to you, and it is not something that any kid would want to make up." However, there is a very real concern for the incalculable damage done to a person falsely accused of child sexual abuse.

Indeed, the whole question of these offences is so unattractive and causes such pain and anger that there is a tendency to respond to offenders by saying, "Throw them in jail, lock them up, forget about them." That kind of response, whether it comes from an individual or the general public, is short-sighted and dangerous, because we cannot just "forget about them." It is also unfair, in my view, in our democratic society to reject out of hand that which is bad and ugly without serious effort to improve and rehabilitate.

We were reminded by Dr. John Bradford, the Director of Forensic Psychiatry at the Royal Ottawa Hospital, that people do not choose to have the dysfunction that leads them to sexually abuse children. It is something innate that develops in them, a compulsion for this type of behaviour. It is not just a criminal problem, as contained in this bill. It is much more complicated than that; and no matter how distasteful, our society must force itself to look beyond the alleged deterrence of long prison terms toward meaningful efforts at treatment and control of the psychological and biological impulses which cause offenders to commit these dreadful acts.

Throwing sexual offenders in jail for long periods of time and then putting them back on to the street without a concentrated effort to rehabilitate them before their release and during their parole is worse than wrong, because it virtually guarantees that those people will offend again and again. Long sentences in themselves will not do the job, and this is an area which needs great consideration.

There was disagreement among some of our witnesses as to the degree to which child sexual offenders can effectively be treated. However, there is clear evidence that some positive results can be achieved through behavioural and pharmacological treatment, including hormone reduction.

Obviously there are wide differences among child sexual offenders, and some respond more readily to treatment than others. For instance, Dr. Bradford and other witnesses indicated that the greatest success, in terms of rehabilitation, can be achieved with those who commit incest, even to the point of re-integrating them with their families, while the most difficult to prevent from re-offending were homosexual paedophiles who molest young boys.

Dr. William Marshall of the Kingston Sexual Offenders Clinic noted that the ideal situation is to give offenders treatment in jail and then release them under supervision to a treatment centre or a halfway house in order to ease them back into the community. Many of our witnesses, whose prime concern was the safety of children, nonetheless emphasized the need for far greater opportunities for treatment of offenders, because that in itself is a protection for children.

• (1610)

One thing which became very clear, both through Canadian and American witnesses, is that many of the treatment programs for child sexual offenders are relatively new, because little research is being done on the problem in either country. Because of the repugnant nature of the offence, those in the field find little enthusiasm from governments or other sources of funding to commit much to research in this area. Dr. Bradford runs one of the few sexual behaviour clinics in the country, and he would urge the federal government to set up an institute of sex research in Canada so this issue can be directly addressed by the many qualified Canadians with international reputations for excellence in this field.

If one goes back to the statistics at the beginning of my speech—50 per cent of Canadian women and 33 per cent of Canadian men who at some point in their lives have been subjected to unwanted sexual interference—surely the need is evident for innovative, preventive and rehabilitative work in this field. There are other important areas which cannot properly be part of the legal thrust of this particular legislation but are, nonetheless, linked to it because of their impact on the issue of child sexual abuse. I have just spoken of the lack of research, and we were made aware by a number of witnesses, most particularly the Social Services Minister of Nova Scotia, Edmund Morris, of the appalling lack of statistical data in this country on every aspect of child sexual abuse—the type of activity, the age and sex of offenders, regional differences, economic and social backgrounds—the whole picture of the problem which would aid in determining the most effective response by governments and other agencies and professions.

Never was this more starkly evident than in the testimony of Donna Weaselchild of the Native Women's Association of Alberta, who has been active in the field of family violence. She and her association have undertaken a study of the impact on native women of separation from family and incidents of child abuse in their younger years. There are no statistics whatever in place in my province on child sexual abuse for native women. Ms. Weaselchild initially found a reluctance on reserves to respond to her survey. Because of the treasured position of children in the native culture, there was particular reluctance to admit the existence and the extent of child sexual abuse, she told us. So we must have a lot more facts on the issue in this country, and we must find a way of collecting and disseminating this knowledge to the greatest effect.

The Parliamentary Spouses Association, which made a truly excellent presentation in its first ever appearance before a parliamentary committee, strongly urged the implementation of a recommendation from the Badgley and Fraser reports for a secretariat within the federal government which would act as a national clearing house for information on child sexual abuse. It was their view that it should be established in the Department of National Health and Welfare, with a strong educational component and a mandate to coordinate activities of various departments of government. In this context, I want to urge governments and communities to heed the appeal from the young people from the Youth-in-Care network for post-assault treatment. We must understand that for a child the issue does not just end with a court case or, indeed, when an investigation is dropped. It has a pervasive and prolonged effect on the victim, and they have literally to learn how to live their lives around that incident of abuse.

We heard one young girl state that she had been in the care of social services for five years and has yet to receive specific counselling to get her through her unresolved feelings as a result of being abused by her father. In this case the matter did not go to court. She has been through a series of foster homes. The father is still living with her family. He has had help, and she has not. She wonders who is being treated like the guilty party.

I also would like to transmit another major appeal we heard from the majority of our witnesses. Can we please make our court surroundings for these cases more humane for children? Through their very physical structure and trappings our courts are set out as the centre of power and authority for our laws and the people who interpret our laws. For an adult they are intimidating. One has only to visit the magnificent art deco structure which houses the Supreme Court of Canada to experience an almost overwhelming sensation of the ultimate hierarchy of the law. These are not places meant for children. From the moment they enter the court they are drained of the confidence and the will to challenge the dominance of the adult world. In the words of Donna Weaselchild, reflecting on experiences with native child victims:

For a child who is under three feet in height, can you imagine him or her standing there, looking up at the judge who must look like a giant? Simply having to climb the stairs; having to stand in the witness box because he or she is too short to even sit in the chair?

One of our teenage witnesses described how she testified standing up, with the trauma of her father in the courtroom, because the judge refused to give her a chair. We heard testimony of efforts being made by judges in some jurisdictions in the United States to reduce this overwhelming atmosphere by arranging to have hearings around a table, by judges removing their robes, coming down as ordinary people to the level of the child in order to lessen the fear. We learned of children being permitted to have a supportive adult beside them while testifying, and being given aids such as anatomical dolls to help them describe their story when they do not have the right words to use. Honourable senators, with sensitivity and goodwill, there must be some way to ease the atmosphere in the courtroom now that we are giving the child the right to communicate his or her story.

Finally—and I want to thank honourable senators for their patience, because I have taken a long time to discuss this issue today—I urge, with the greatest conviction, that our Justice Minister and provincial attorneys general get together to work out a mechanism to ensure that child sexual abuse cases will be processed through the courts with all reasonable speed. The very nature of this offence guarantees that a child will be further traumatized by reliving it again and again over months, and sometimes even years, as the process is delayed step by step. We heard of the example of the little boy in Nova Scotia who, because of delays, had spent half of his young life in a world of doctors, police and lawyers, waiting for his case to reach the courts. These delays may happen because of defence manoeuvres on the part of the accused, but I suspect very often they result from an overcrowded court schedule. Surely it is not beyond the scope of our legal system to devise a way to proceed expeditiously with child sexual abuse cases, even if it means the appointment of more judges, particularly judges with, it is to be hoped, a background in family law.

● (1620)

Honourable senators, this bill is not the end of the process. It must be part of a broader evolution in our system to deal fairly with sexually abused children and their abusers, and provide each with the support and treatment that will diminish the tragedy. I say "diminish," honourable senators, because the tragic circumstances will always be with us, no matter what laws we pass. There will always be dark secrets.

I will conclude with the wise words to our committee by the Northwest Territories Justice Minister Michael A. Ballantyne.

We as members of society must be willing to take off our rose-coloured glasses, open the closet and expose this horrendous problem in order that we may find effective solutions and discourage potential offenders. In order to combat the serious problem, we all need to take responsibility—the individual, the extended family, the communities and, indeed, the neighbourhoods within communities. It is only through such concerted efforts that solutions will be found to this terrible problem.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: I would like to intervene briefly before you adjourn the debate.

Honourable senators, first of all, I would like to congratulate Senator Fairbairn on her reasonable and balanced treatment of this bill and her reasonable and balanced references to the pre-study of the committee, which is recorded in today's Minutes of Proceedings, beginning on page 957.

There were two aspects of this bill that I wanted to comment upon before I listened to Senator Fairbairn. Now I need only comment on one of them, because she pointed out that the report dealt with the reservations which some members of the committee had about the use of videotapes, and that this would have to be done in a carefully controlled manner and reviewed from time to time, particularly in view of the unsatisfactory response to the use of videotapes in some jurisdictions in the United States of America.

Senator Fairbairn did not mention the other point that I want to comment on. I am a Common Law lawyer, and I believe strongly in the Common Law principle that a person is innocent until proven guilty. I am concerned when I hear Senator Fairbairn say that we have to strike a balance between the protection of the rights of the accused and the avoidance of creating a traumatic situation for the person allegedly offended. Perhaps we do have to strike a balance, but I still cannot help but say that the necessity to prove the guilt of the accused beyond a reasonable doubt is, to me, a strong and important principle in our law.

I note that the committee draws attention to this, and I will satisfy myself merely by reading from three paragraphs in the committee's report.

The committee says that it fully supports the repeal of corroboration requirements in section 246.4. If I were put on the spot now, I would say that I do not think I fully support them.

The Committee fully supports the repeal of corroboration requirements in section 246.4. We agree that there should be no absolute rule that children's evidence must be corroborated before it can support a conviction. We are concerned, however, about the re-enactment in that section of words first added to the Criminal Code in 1983, to the effect that a judge, in certain sexual offence prosecutions "... shall not instruct the jury that it is unsafe to find the accused guilty in the absence of corroboration".

Some witnesses who appeared before the Committee took the position that this provision is precluding judges from making any comment at all on the absence of corroborative evidence. Departmental officials, on the other hand, assured us that the section was intended to, and in practice does no more than prevent a presiding judge from making an instruction as to the "unsafe" nature of uncorroborated convictions. As yet, however, there have been no appellate decisions upholding this interpretation.

Finally, the committee says, and I underline this and record it as a very important part of their submission:

We are of the opinion that a trial judge should be free to comment on the absence of corroboration, so long as he or she refrains from making an instruction of the kind noted above. We recommend that the Department closely monitor decisions under s. 246.4, and take immediate action if those decisions place restrictions on the traditional role of the judiciary in providing assistance to the trier of fact in the assessment of evidence.

Notwithstanding the importance of protecting children from sexual abuse, which is important, I would say to any normal, right-thinking man or woman, we all know that, nevertheless, children do sometimes have fantastic and exaggerated imaginations. When instructed by too-avid social workers or teachers, their imaginings may go a little too far, and there may be some instances where it is proper for the judge to caution the jury that lack of corroborative evidence is a significant factor. Nevertheless, I am glad that this legislation has come before us. I certainly support it, but I point out the reservations in the committee's own report, which I have just read to you.

As the legislation is reviewed from time to time, I hope further attention will be given to the application of these provisions, particularly section 246.4.

[Senator Fairbairn.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I was going to move the adjournment of the debate, but I will not because Senator Hicks has made the points that I wanted to make. That is, how much I support the second paragraph of the committee's report on page 959 about the importance of monitoring the interpretation of section 246.4 on the question of corroboration because of the fact that the principles of such a good bill can sometimes mean that in our zeal to support it we sacrifice other important principles. Therefore, I support the committee's report, and particularly that paragraph about keeping an eye on the interpretation. For the reasons Senator Hicks advanced, the judge should be free to comment, if he thinks it worthwhile to comment, on the lack of corroboration.

On motion of Senator Neiman, debate adjourned.

VETERANS APPEAL BOARD BILL

SECOND READING—DEBATE ADJOURNED

Hon. Jack Marshall moved the second reading of Bill C-66, to establish the Veterans Appeal Board and to amend other acts in relation thereto.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to rise to introduce Bill C-66, which has the effect of merging, in the Department of Veterans Affairs, the Pension Review Board and the War Veteran's Allowance Board, two independent quasi-judicial bodies, into one newly designated Veterans Appeal Board, and by doing so will make better use of existing resources without diminishing existing appeal rights for veterans in any way whatsoever.

The merger will allow the Pension Review Board, which is the last level of appeal, to better deal with the ever increasing strain on its annual caseload, which has increased by almost 100 per cent from 1,335 applications to 2,654 applications in just three years.

It is an obvious fact, honourable senators, that as veterans grow older, their disabilities tend to become more serious. That is why more and more pension claims are coming forward each year.

• (1630)

I might also say that part of the reason that more claims are coming in is because of the great expectations that veterans now have because of the new manner in which the Department of Veterans Affairs, under its minister, is dealing with veterans and its consideration of veterans as special citizens as well as the minister's move to ensure that Canada's commitment to veterans is real.

By way of contrast to the Pension Review Board, the War Veterans Allowance Board carries a lighter workload as veterans grow older.

War veterans allowance is an income-tested program. Once veterans reach age 65, they become eligible for old age security benefits and are then less dependent on DVA for income support. The result, then, naturally means that the number of appeals coming before the War Veterans Allowance Board has dropped by 73 per cent in the last three years.

Yet, honourable senators, at present the War Veterans Allowance Board has more person year resources than the Pension Review Board. By combining both boards it will permit a concentration of resources in the area where they are needed—pension appeals.

I understand that no public service layoffs will result from the amalgamation. The overall estimated savings will be $400,000 this fiscal year. At the present time the War Veterans Allowance Board has 35 person years, and PRB has 25 person years.

It is worthwhile mentioning also that substantial progress has been made in reducing delays in the disability pension process. In the last two-and-one-half years the time required to process applications has been cut by well over half.

But at the same time, a far greater percentage of the decisions are going in favour of the veteran today than was the case previously, as a result of previous legislation. As I indicated, these results have been achieved despite the fact that the workload has doubled.

It is obvious, honourable senators, that the merging of the two boards is unusually realistic and sensible, and will result in directing the resources of the department, where better suited, to fulfil a vital need for veterans as they grow older, and to provide a means of speedier adjudication of pension claims. I have no hesitation in requesting speedy passage of all phases of Bill C-66. I am sure that all senators will agree, as all parties agreed in the other place.

In short, then, I ask honourable senators to approve Bill C-66, a measure that will streamline our pension process and enable us to take another step in fulfilling our commitment to Canada's veterans.

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, it had been my intention to speak to second reading today, but in discussion with the sponsor—and in order to expedite other activities today—I will wait until tomorrow. However, I assure you that I will be commending second reading of the bill, that it not go to committee, and that we also give it third reading tomorrow.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, before we adjourn the debate, may I ask a question of the mover of second reading?

In the figures that you gave, Senator Marshall, concerning the numbers of cases dealt with by the Pension Review Board, you mentioned two figures. I would like you to repeat them again and tell me whether those numbers referred to the number of cases per year.

Senator Marshall: No. They have increased from 1,335 to 2,654 applications in just three years.

Senator Hicks: But was that the number in three years, or the number per year that increased over the three-year period?

Senator Marshall: I would presume that it is three years, but I can check that out to be certain.

Senator Hicks: I would be interested in knowing that.

Senator Marshall: Thank you.

Senator McElman: If I could be permitted to assist you, Senator Marshall, in the release of the minister he says that "over the last three years the 11-member board"—that is, the Pension Review Board—"has seen its workload increase by 99 per cent from 1,335 to 2,654 appeals per year."

Senator Hicks: That answers my question. Thank you.

On motion of Senator McElman, debate adjourned.

CONSTITUTION ACT, 1867

BILL TO AMEND (ATTENDANCE OF SENATORS)—SECOND READING—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

Second reading of the Bill S-13, An Act to amend the Constitution Act, 1867 (Attendance of Senators).—
(Honourable Senator Godfrey).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, since Order No. 5 stands in Senator Godfrey's name and he has retired, could we have it stand in another name? I think that Senator Hébert would be prepared to have it stand in his name.

Hon. Jacques Hébert: Yes, honourable senators, I would.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Order stands in name of Senator Hébert.

PRIVATE BILL

REGIONAL VICAR FOR CANADA OF THE PRELATURE OF THE HOLY CROSS AND OPUS DEI—SECOND READING—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Bélisle, seconded by the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, for the second reading of the Bill S-7, An Act to incorporate the Regional Vicar for Canada of the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei.—(Honourable Senator Corbin).

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, Bill S-7 was read for the first time on April 2, 1987. The debate on second reading was initiated by Senator Bélisle on April 7, 1987, five days later.

The debate was adjourned several times by Senator Le Moynes. On May 26, my colleague yielded to our colleague, Senator Hébert, while reserving the right to adjourn the debate again. Senator Le Moynes took the floor on June 2 and I subsequently adjourned the debate until June 17, when I gave the first half of a two-part speech.

[Senator Hicks.]

Those are the facts. Although some people would like to give that impression, I did not hold up the debate since April 2. Other senators have adjourned debate for a longer period, and I agree they had that right.

There are some people who claimed, and here I quote Senator Bélisle:

... we have heard ... mainly, not to say exclusively, one side of the story.

This is at page 1440 of the Debates of the Senate, June 26, 1987.

Well, is anyone to blame for this situation? Three senators expressed their objections to Bill S-7. Only one senator tried to defend the bill. Why were there not more? Personally, I said that the bill would be referred to committee. I certainly do not intend to keep the bill in this chamber indefinitely.

Honourable senators, I am prepared to let Senator Bélisle take the floor immediately, if he feels we should hear the other side of the story.

It may be he feels guilty about his all too short speech on second reading and the lack of relevant material. I am quite willing to listen to Senator Bélisle right away, provided it does not have the effect of closing the debate on second reading. However, I would give him that privilege after pronouncing the second part of my speech and after any speeches by other senators who may wish to speak to this bill.

His right as the sponsor of the bill will then be guaranteed, and he could also help expedite the legislation by advancing the date of referral of the bill to committee. He might even save me some precious time I need to do the research for the last part of my speech. However, if Senator Bélisle can't take advantage of this opportunity right away, I have no choice but to move adjournment of the debate, assuming that the moment of truth promised by Senator Bélisle can wait and that there is really no urgent need to consider the bill in committee.

However, that being said, there is a better reason to give him the floor right away, with the unanimous consent. Friday, when I was momentarily absent from the Senate, he rose and said among other things:

All that I told you in my speech introducing ... the bill holds true, but ...

And in the words of Senator Bélisle:

... so many false accusations have been made against the Prelature Opus Dei and its members that justice warrants a fair hearing.

I challenge Senator Bélisle to rise and tell us what these false accusations are and who made them. Name the originators of these false accusations! Say who they are, refute their arguments, or else apologize for having gone too far and for having used unparliamentary language, because the expression ...

[English]

It is unparliamentary language to use the expression "false statement". I would refer to page 107 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, Fifth Edition.

[Translation]

Dear colleague, you ought not to be allowed to cast doubt on the integrity of your colleagues, collectively or severally, be they named Hébert, Le Moyne or Corbin.

Be strong, be virile, be a man, as described in Balaguer's El Camino. We are listening to you, you who seem to have a monopoly on the truth about Opus Dei. We are giving you the opportunity to withdraw your unparliamentary remarks.

Honourable senators, I reserve the right to adjourn this part of the debate. With the unanimous consent of the chamber, I am only giving Senator Bélisle the chance to withdraw the offending and unparliamentary comments he made about three of his colleagues in this place. Unless he does so, I will move that the debate be adjourned to a later date.

[English]

Hon. Rhéal Bélisle: Honourable senators, I have never been faced with such a request. Is it possible that an honourable senator may speak twice on second reading?

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Sometimes even three times!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): A hundred times!

Senator Flynn: Yes, with leave of the Senate, a hundred times.

[English]

The sponsor may speak twice.

Senator Bélisle: If honourable senators are willing to give me another opportunity to respond to what may be said later, then I will speak today.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I do not think there is any doubt that if you are speaking on second reading then, with unanimous consent, you can speak as often as you wish without closing the debate. The provision in the rule is that an honourable senator be given the right to reply and not close the debate. As Senator Flynn has said, you have a right of reply at the end.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, so that there may be no misunderstanding, what I seek is that Senator Bélisle correct or withdraw the terms he has used.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: This is not what you said the last time.

Senator Corbin: Let me finish, you will see that my remarks are consistent.

[English]

The last part of my intervention was to ask Senator Bélisle to withdraw offending remarks with respect to, I presume, the only three persons who rose in this house, besides himself, to speak to Bill S-7. He has accused one, two or all three of his colleagues of making false statements. I have cited the rule under Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms where such unparliamentary language is unacceptable.

[Translation]

First things first, honourable senators. In answer to the very relevant remark made a moment ago by Senator Flynn, I would ask Senator Bélisle to withdraw his offending words about his colleagues, and then we will settle the rest.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, if I understand correctly, Senator Corbin has agreed that Senator Bélisle be given the opportunity to speak, that the debate would then be adjourned again in your name, and that other senators might seek the floor. That was the gist of your first proposition.

Now, do you grant leave on the condition that he withdraw his words?

Senator Corbin: No, there is no condition.

Senator Flynn: If there is no condition, we quite agree that Senator Bélisle might seek the floor now. Should he see fit to correct whatever he may have said, he will be free to do so. As to your point of order, however, I would point out that merely saying that there were false accusations or false statements does not necessarily imply that the person who made them did so intentionally. A point of order may be raised indeed when someone suggests that you knowingly made a false statement or knowingly reported something which is not correct, because very often someone may make a false statement when quoting somebody else or the authorities. Surely I have the right to say that what you are reporting, dear colleague, is false. Surely I have the right to say that. But if I claim that you are deliberately making a false statement, then you have the right to object. That is altogether different.

As to the permission given Senator Bélisle, I did understand what you said and I agree.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, I admit that Senator Flynn did understand me correctly. Senator Flynn, you will agree that questions of procedure concerning parliamentary language must be corrected at the earliest opportunity. In my case, the earliest opportunity arose when I became aware of this a moment ago.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I think that there is a misunderstanding on the part of Senator Corbin. Senator Bélisle may have said that false or unfounded statements were made, but that does not give anyone the right to rise on a point of order to ask for a retraction, unless there was an accusation of having voluntarily made a false statement. For instance, in this case, if Senator Bélisle believes the statements made by Senators Hébert, Le Moyne et Corbin to be false, he can say: "In my opinion, what you have reported is false."

You cannot demand retraction of such a statement because no one is accusing the senator concerned of having voluntarily made a false statement or of voluntarily misleading the Senate.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, we have to put the comments of Senator Bélisle in context and consider what was happening at the time. What was he doing? For all practical purposes, he was suggesting that I had told him I would not speak before he himself had retired.

Senator Flynn: That is something completely different!

Senator Corbin: No, it is all related.

Senator Flynn: You are mixing everything up.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, as I said at the beginning of the sitting, my comments have been misinterpreted. It is not my fault if Senator Bélisle has no sense of humour. I am not to blame, especially as I said in my comments the previous week that, as far as I was concerned, the bill could be referred to committee even though I do not much like it. When it goes to committee, we can call witnesses.

In the last paragraph of his point of order, he speaks of "so many false accusations". This is related to his question of privilege about myself. I had the feeling that he was not thinking only of me. Who apart, from Senators Hébert, Le Moyne and myself, has spoken on this matter?

Perhaps he did not want to go as far as he did. If such is the case, let him say so and I shall accept his word as an honourable senator. The matter will be settled.

However, I find the accusation serious. It could certainly speed up this debate if we allowed Senator Bélisle to tell the honourable senators why he believes that Senators Le Moyne, Hébert and Corbin have completely misunderstood the Opus Dei or have had a tendency to make false accusations. I do not see to whom he could have been referring if not to us. I attach no condition to letting him speak now, even if we have to adjourn the debate in my name after his intervention and let him close the debate eventually. You did understand that part correctly.

The Hon. the Speaker: Do the honourable senators agree to let Senator Bélisle speak now?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is the decision unanimous?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

● (1650)

[English]

Senator Bélisle: Honourable senators, I first wish to say that what I said on Friday is factual. The honourable senator asked, "When are you going to take your retirement?" That stands.

I wish to inform honourable senators that there is no conflict of interest for me in sponsoring Bill S-7. I have never been and I am not now a member of Opus Dei, but I am very pleased and honoured to have been asked to sponsor this bill in this honourable assembly. I am very thankful to the Opus Dei for making that request of me.

[Translation]

I want to thank my friends and colleagues Senators Hébert, Le Moyne and Corbin, for the interest they have shown in the incorporation of the regional vicar of Opus Dei. They explained their position with their usual passionate eloquence. I listened to them with interest and also very patiently. I would now ask you to listen to another point of view.

[Senator Corbin.]

The honourable senators who rose to speak against Bill S-7 made it clear in no uncertain terms that they did not like the Prelature of Opus Dei. However, is this a matter of likes and dislikes or is it a petition for a private bill to incorporate a function, that of regional vicar of the Prelature of Opus Dei? Even if one senator rose to suggest a fundamental change in the general statutes on incorporation, no one spoke out against the legitimacy and legality of the bill.

I do not intend to respond to every single malicious insinuation, unfounded claim and wrongful assumption. However, I shall try to put the debate into its true perspective. There may be some reluctance to grant this kind of incorporation because one does not share the views of the group in question. Most of us do not belong to the Mormon religion nor do we particularly favour that religion, but we adopted a similar bill not so long ago. It did not cause any more controversy than the case of many Catholic and Anglican bishops in this country who enjoy the same status. And now, some people are upset that the regional vicar of an institution, enjoying the same recognition as the Catholic bishops and belonging to the same jurisdictional structure of the Catholic church, is making a similar request.

Our honourable colleagues talked about truth and freedom. I shall be glad to take them literally. I daresay my remarks will be worthy of the concepts our colleagues use so generously. "Truth has its rights", according to Senator Hébert. And to defend those rights, he systematically resorted to reproducing every bit of gossip that was unfavourable to Opus Dei although it had been refuted by the facts many times over. He told us he had read thousands of pages about Opus Dei. Is it possible to read so many pages without finding anything positive about this institution of the Catholic Church? Can one at the same time seek the truth and be selective in one's reading?

Honourable senators, if we are really looking for the truth, we should at least listen to both sides. This is a principle of natural justice. If we really want to know the truth about an organization, we cannot hear testimony only from its detractors and opponents. We should at least listen to those who have first-hand information about the institution in question. Members of Opus Dei have, of course, been criticized for constantly repeating the same speeches, and denying malicious insinuations that have never been proved but often repeated. Is it not typical of the truth that it never contradicts itself? In fact, when we are talking about rumours, hearsay and gossip, it is not hard to find the contradictions. I will take a few examples from the speeches made by my colleagues:

[English]

How can members of Opus Dei be an influential, elite group yet brainwashed zombies at one and the same time? How can its founder teach sado-masochism, on the one hand, and purity and chastity, on the other? How can it be, on the one hand, that Opus Dei is said to be a controlling force in political and economic life and, on the other hand, that professional activities are said to be the sole responsibility of the individual members? How can a book like The Way be criticized for being mediocre and, at the same time, for being so demanding? How can members of the Opus Dei be accused at the same time of being secretive and of flooding people with documentation about the prelature? How can they be both extremely mortified and be leading a bourgeois life?

How could the 69 cardinals and the 1300 bishops, over one third of the world episcopate—and I repeat, how could the 69 cardinals and the 1300 bishops, over one third of the world episcopate—who asked that the canonization process of Monseigneur Escriva be opened, have been so duped? I am truly saddened that such a plea for the recognition of a person's sanctity, without precedent in the history of the Catholic church, could be so one-sidedly ridiculed in this house.

In addition, how could five popes, including the present one, who consistently approved of Opus Dei since its inception, have been so mesmerized? Since as far back as 1950, Monseigneur Escriva had obtained permission from the Holy See to admit people who are non-Catholic and non-Christian as cooperators. How could these thousands of non-Catholics, and even non-Christians, who have cooperated with the apostolates of the Opus Dei, have been so wrong about this so-called "totalitarian" organization? What can this astonishing thing be which some people are so anxious to oppose that in doing so they do not mind contradicting themselves?

[Translation]

At this point, I feel I must draw a parallel with a most interesting speech by Senator Marshall on June 2 about the film "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", which warned me about the danger of confusing fact with fiction and of the disastrous consequences this could have for a person's reputation.

While listening to that speech, I was reminded of what Senators Hébert and Le Moine had to say about the same film, and I wondered why the honourable senators were so insistent on having us believe that a certain television program on Opus Dei by "The Fifth Estate" was fact and not fiction. Especially since after the broadcast, newspapers like the Globe and Mail and The Gazette published some balanced articles on Opus Dei, and Cardinal Carter stated, as reported in the Toronto Star of May 9, 1985,

[English]

I quote:

● (1700)

"It was said in some of the public media that I was carrying out an investigation of Opus Dei.", Carter said Tuesday as he officially opened an Opus Dei centre on Palmerston Boulevard.

That is in Toronto:

"I take this opportunity simply to deny that openly and clearly. There was never an investigation of Opus Dei." At Tuesday's ceremony, Carter said Opus Dei authorities have been "very open and up front" with him. "I've had nothing to hide, they've had nothing to hide and therefore there was nothing to investigate.", Carter said.

A few days after the broadcast of this program, Cardinal Carter stated that it was highly slanted and that it has misrepresented Opus Dei.

Much has been said by Senator Hébert about the so-called constitutions that were allegedly translated in a book he read. The honourable senator will be happy to learn that the Prelature happens to be governed by statutes that the Holy See sanctioned on November 28, 1982. These statutes are in the possession of the bishop of each diocese where the Prelature has at least one canonically erected centre, and they contain 185 articles only.

I wonder, therefore, about the reliability of the source my colleagues were quoting when they referred to articles 193, 197 and 202. In Canada those statutes are in the possession of the Archbishops of Quebec, Montreal, Toronto, Ottawa and the Bishop of Valleyfield.

[Translation]

For example, in article 89 one can read how Opus Dei members must reveal their membership in the Prelature. Here is the relevant part of paragraph 2:

89.2 So as to achieve its ends more efficiently... the congregation of the Prelature... must not hide their membership in the Prelature because the spirituality of Opus Dei is to absolutely avoid secret and clandestinity. (...) For these reasons, in each circumscription the names of the vicars of the Prelate and of the members of his council are known to everyone; upon request of the bishops, they are told not only the names of the priests of the Prelature who exercise their ministry in their diocese, but also the names of the directors of centres established in the diocese.

Article 88 deals with obedience in the field of spiritual activities, as well as freedom in all other fields. Paragraph 3 reads as follows:

[English]

I quote:

Regarding professional activity and social, political doctrine, etc., each faithful of the Prelature enjoys the same full freedom—within the limits of the Catholic faith and morals—which the rest of the Catholic citizens enjoy. For the authorities of the Prelature must abstain from giving advice of any sort whatsoever in these matters. Moreover, this full freedom can only be diminished by norms that might possibly be given for all Catholics in any diocese or circumscription, by the bishop or conference of bishops. Therefore, the Prelature does not in any way make its own the professional, social, political or economic works, etc., of any of its faithful.

[Translation]

Still concerning the truth, allow me to quote a letter from Cardinal John Heenan, then Archbishop of Westminster, extracts of which were published in London's Clergy Review of February 1986:

[English]

I quote:

One of the proofs of God's favour is to be a sign of contradiction. Almost all founders of societies in the church have suffered. Monsignor Escriva de Balaguer is no exception. Opus Dei has been attacked and its motives misunderstood. In this country and elsewhere an inquiry has always vindicated Opus Dei.

This, honourable senators, is the perspective from which our colleagues' allegations have to be studied. If, indeed, as they claim, their sources are beyond scrutiny; if, indeed, their information is beyond suspicion; and if, indeed, their claims are beyond any doubt, why then is it that no one has ever brought Opus Dei and its members to court? Why is it that no one has ever brought these powerful proofs in front of any tribunal anywhere?

I will concede that Opus Dei has been condemned from time to time by some of the high courts of the media. However, in these high courts, in contrast to the courts of our country, one is presumed guilty until proven innocent; and the last thing these courts want is to be confused with the facts! Nevertheless, the media have, on occasion, been themselves brought to court. In Germany, for example, after facts were studied and weighed, they were condemned and forced to retract and correct the calumnious allegations they had made against Opus Dei. On other occasions the media have recognized that they had been manipulated. Le Devoir in Montreal, for example, corrected, in an editorial of May 11, the attacks it had levelled against Opus Dei a few days before.

Senator Corbin: What year?

Senator Bélisle: Nineteen eighty-seven, my Lord.

Senator Corbin: "My Lord"?

Senator Bélisle: In every serious inquiry regarding Opus Dei carried out by the Church or by state bodies, the aforementioned statement of Cardinal Heenan has always held true. Let us again look at two examples.

Within the Catholic Church a thorough study was made from 1979 to 1982 in response to the petition of Opus Dei to be granted a juridical status befitting its characteristics. At the end of this complete study of the spirit, practices and the proposed statutes of Opus Dei, the Pope erected Opus Dei as a personal Prelature with the Apostolic Constitution Ut Sit, dated November 28, 1982. As it is mentioned in the preamble to Bill S-7, this document reads as follows:

John Paul, Bishop, Servant of the Servants of God, for a permanent record of the matter: with very great hope, the Church directs its attention and maternal care to Opus Dei which, by divine inspiration, the Servant of God Josemaria Escriva de Balaguer founded in Madrid on October 2, 1928, so that it may always be an apt and effective instrument of the salvific mission which the Church carries out for the life of the world.

● (1710)

And the Pope continues:

From its beginning, this institution has in fact striven, not only to illuminate with new lights the mission of the laity in the church and in society, but also to put it into practice; it has also endeavoured to put into practice the teaching of the universal call to sanctity, and to promote to all levels of society the sanctification of ordinary work, and by means of ordinary work.

As you can see, my presentation of this bill was not based on naive misunderstanding but on the judgment of the present Pope and on the law of the Catholic Church. The quotation is worth continuing, because I think it is important to hear what the supreme authority of the Roman Catholic Church has to say about one of its institutions:

Since Opus Dei has grown, with the help of divine grace, to the extent that it has spread and works in a large number of dioceses throughout the world, as an apostolic organism made of priests and laity, both men and women, which is at the same time organic and undivided—that is to say, of an institution endowed with a unity of spirit, of aims, of government, and of formation—it has become necessary to give it a juridical configuration which is suited to its specific characteristics.

After referring to the development of a study that began in 1962, with the approval of Paul VI, and which was followed by another one started in 1979, John Paul II continues:

In carrying out the task entrusted to it, the Sacred Congregation for bishops carefully examined the matter, taking into account the historical, and also the juridical and pastoral aspects. Thus, having completely eliminated all doubts about the basis, and the possibility, and the specific manner of granting the petition, it became abundantly clear that the desired transformation of Opus Dei into a personal Prelature was opportune and useful.

The result of this in-depth investigation is eloquent, and it is in conformity with both this new juridical configuration and the laws of our country that the Regional Vicar of Canada of this prelature wishes to be incorporated.

[Translation]

Not only the Church but the state as well scrutinized the Prelature of Opus Dei. Indeed, honourable senators, as a result of questions raised by parliamentarians the Italian Minister of the Interior tabled a very well documented report in the Italian Parliament in November 1986.

As a second example of serious and exhaustive study, let us see the conclusion of this report after an official response from the Holy See, after consulting and extensively quoting the statutes of the Prelature. I quote:

1. Opus Dei is not secret, either in law or in fact;
2. The obligation of obedience exclusively concerns the spiritual realm;
3. There are no rights nor obligations other than those specified in the Code of Individual Rights, and these too are of a strictly spiritual nature;
4. Unless provided for under the new regime, no right nor obligation of the former regime has survived the institution of the Prelature.

Consequently neither the government nor the Minister of the Interior in particular can legitimately do anything about Opus Dei, nor make investigations into or impose controls over it. Indeed, on the basis of the precepts of the Constitution and the basic rights of freedom it guarantees; . . . on the basis of the Acts which govern the Prelature, finally on the basis of the statements of the Holy See which, as we said, express the official position and commits the Prelature itself, such investigations and controls, unwarranted by any factual element likely to include even simple clues, would lead to an unacceptable breach of the right of freedom of the citizen, and to as unacceptable an interference of the state in the "internal order of the Church".

Honourable senators, where is the truth about Opus Dei? In thoroughly researched investigations or in scurrilous pamphlets? Is one really seeking the truth when one casually rejects the serious documents our honourable colleague had in his possession?

Let us now move from one great theme to the next. For his part, Senator Le Moyne poses as the defender of freedom. But what freedom are we talking about? The one we all look for, the one which is protected by our Charter of Rights and Freedoms, or is it another one, his own perhaps?

[English]

The honourable senator provided the clear answer to the question and the clue to his whole attitude vis-à-vis not only Opus Dei but the whole Catholic Church when he says:

—the dominant characteristic of our age is criticism. For us moderns, anybody, anything stands to be criticized . . . We can speak here without undue exaggeration of a real mutation of human understanding, and conclude that as the essence of modernity, criticism constitutes the very legitimacy of the age.

If these words hold true then I fear for the future, not only of religious freedom in this country but for that of any other freedom. For what Senator Le Moyne is saying here is that in making a judgment about the desirability or the undesirability of incorporating the Regional Vicar of Opus Dei, we should be guided not by the Charter of Rights, which recognizes the freedom of religion, nor by what Opus Dei says of itself, nor by what the Roman Catholic Church says it is, nor by what thousands of honest and attached observers know it is but, rather, by what men, for whom "anybody and anything stands to be criticized," interpret it to be. What the senator is saying is that our judgment regarding the incorporation of the Regional Vicar of Opus Dei should be predicated on a criticism of its experiences and beliefs. The amazing thing is that our distinguished colleague has fallen into the very same trap which he claimed to be denouncing. Without providing any serious evidence he says that Opus Dei represents a form of religious intolerance and, yet, in the name of modernity, he says he opposes the very principle of the bill. Is not this kind of modernity another form of dogmatism?

Senator Le Moyne has made it very clear that he cannot tolerate Opus Dei. So he has opted for intolerance. People whose concept of modernity does not fit with his own are declared to be heretics; hence, the Regional Vicar of Opus Dei cannot have the incorporation he seeks, and which has always been granted to others in similar functions. What Senator Le Moyne has amply demonstrated in that criticism, or what he calls modernity, is but another religion, a secular religion, and one that is quite intolerant of traditional religions.

[Translation]

I had not intended to speak about the founder of the Opus Dei, Monsignor Escriva, but so many unfair comments have been made about him that I now find it necessary to correct them.

A large number of important people in the Catholic Church consider Monsignor Escriva to be one of the forerunners of the Second Council of the Vatican in one of its most important teachings, namely the role of the laity in the Church.

In a homily to members of the Opus Dei, John Paul II said the following:

Senator Corbin: When was this?

Senator Bélisle: I do not know the date, but I shall find out. John Paul II told the Opus Dei:

Yours is truly a great ideal, as from the very start, you have anticipated the lay apostolate which became one of the main features of the Church in the years of the council and later on.

Cardinal Koenig, then Archbishop of Vienna, wrote the following in 1975 about the founder of the Opus Dei:

As early as 1928 when he founded the organization, in 1928, he had looked ahead to what has now become the common ideal of the Church with the Second Council of the Vatican.

I could go on, honourable senators, by quoting the comments of two former apostolic delegates to Canada, Cardinals Baggio and Pignedoli, of Cardinals Sin of Manilla, Otunga of Nairobi, Hoeffner of Cologne, Casariego of Guatemala, and at least 30 others who have published very favourable articles about him, but this is neither the proper place nor time.

I simply wish to underline that those who consider the founder of the Opus Dei as a pioneer of lay apostolate are impressive both by their number and their expertise, in contrast with the well-intentioned, but unfortunately not very enlightened statements made by our colleagues.

Nevertheless, Senator Le Moyne had no compunction about criticizing mercilessly the book The Way written by the founder of the Opus Dei. This work has been extremely successful, with three and a half million copies being printed in 36 different languages. Our colleague admitted that he was not aware of this book as recently as a few weeks ago. Now, he has become an exegete expert.

Others, with deeper knowledge and more experience than our colleague, hold strikingly contrasting views about The Way. For instance, on December 8, 1983, Cardinal Vachon, archbishop of Quebec, wrote an introductory note to the first Canadian edition of The Way, in which we find the following:

The writings of Monsignor Escriva have been nourishing the spiritual life of a great many people, even non-Catholics and non-Christians for quite a while... The clear and specific message of The Way has its roots in the gospel itself. His direct style invites the reader to reflect and brings him to a true interior conversion. Only the classical works of spiritual literature are worthy of such praise and The Way is in my opinion one of the most expressive of these to be published in our time.

In his speech, our colleague gave us a whole series of interpretations of some of the passages contained in The Way, including the last point, number 999, which gave rise to a long tirade on the multiplicatory magic of cabalistic symbolism. I would like to share with you the simpler explanation given by Monsignor Escriva. In a posthumous work entitled The Furrow, his last thought concerns number 999 and reads as follows:

I write this point so that we may smile, you and I, at the end of this book, and to reassure the good readers who, through ingenuity or malice, had thought of finding the Cabala in the 999 points of The Way.

Senator Le Moynes presented item 394 as a way to use the totalitarian plug. Since he quoted only part of it, I will read all of item 394:

394. Compromising is a sure sign of not having the truth. When a man compromises on points of ideal, honour or faith, that man is a... man without ideal, honour or faith.

As we can see, honourable senators, any author can be alleged to have said all kinds of things by quoting selectively, out of context.

Senator Le Moynes also rose against the fact that The Way was compared to the great classics of spiritual literature, claiming such a comparison was made by Opus Dei members. Let us come back to the comments of another cardinal. This time, we will call upon Albino Luciani who wrote an article on Opus Dei one month before he was elected Pope under the name John Paul I. I am quoting from the translation reproduced in Le Devoir on October 19, 1978:

Escriva de Balaguer constantly said, based on the Gospel: Christ expects from us not only a little kindness, but a lot of kindness... There, on the street, at the office, at the plant, one becomes a saint provided one does one's duty with competence, for love of God and with joy.

To quote again:

... Similar things were taught by Saint Francis of Sales, 300 years before... Escriva de Balaguer however in many respects goes further than Francis of Sales. The latter also preaches sainthood for all, but he seems to be teaching only "spirituality for layman", while Escriva wants "lay spirituality".

You will agree that such a parallel between Saint Francis of Sales and Monsignor Escriva drawn by the smiling Pope is somewhat at variance, both in substance and spirit, with the bellicose comments of our colleague. You will allow me, honourable senators, to quote the end of the same article.

Opus Dei is content with helping its members make free, responsible choices—also in politics. It may happen that one of its members is appointed to important functions. In that case, that is his business, not that of Opus Dei. When in 1957 an elevated personality congratulated Escriva on the occasion of one of his spiritual sons having been appointed Minister in Spain, he got that rather curt answer: "What does it matter if he is Minister or floor sweeper! What matters is that he sanctifies himself in his work". In that answer lies all Escriva and all the spirit of Opus Dei. Let each one sanctify himself through his work, minister's work, if it so happens that he was appointed to that function. Let him really sanctify himself. Anything else is beyond the point.

● (1730)

[English]

Moreover, there are but a few members of Opus Dei who are in positions of national importance in the world of arts, industry, finance, politics, and so on. The vast majority are ordinary people, not what the media thrives on; they are men and women who desire the peace and freedom to do their own work quietly. I would hardly call this elitism.

As far as the claim that Opus Dei is anti-feminist, suffice it to say that at least half of the members of Opus Dei are women—many of whom have doctorates not only in their own professions but also in philosophy, theology and canon law. How about that for modernity? They direct the activities of their centres and are quite happy with the way things are. If you have any doubt, just ask them if Opus Dei is anti-feminist!

One of our colleagues finds it aggressive that in Opus Dei certain activities of a catechetical nature are usually given to homogeneous groups. Well, I would leave them free to do this if they like. I will also remind you that there are both spiritual and practical reasons that would advise that the celibate men and women, who cherish this gift of celibacy and chastity—for which, by the way, they take no vows—keep a certain prudent distance. This might sound medieval to our colleagues, but it does not take a great deal of intelligence to understand this; although it does, indeed, require a bit of goodwill and common sense.

That Opus Dei should be accused of secrecy is almost a laughable matter. What is wrong with wanting to keep one's personal dedication to God a private matter? I am afraid that our colleagues confuse privacy with secrecy—or have they forgotten that the state has no business in the bedroom of the country and in the conscience of its citizens. In fact, members do not hide their relationship to Opus Dei whenever there is a good reason to make it known.

What, then, are these deep, dark secrets? Would it not be foolish to claim that they have secrets without even being able to ask a question about them?

[Translation]

Honourable senators, I have given you the facts. I hardly need recall that the bill we are considering is called An Act to incorporate the Regional Vicar for Canada of the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei. The purpose of the bill is to incorporate a function presently occupied by Father Haddock and that will be occupied by his successors. We are not talking about incorporating an entire group through a single person. This is sheer fantasy and has no basis in law.

Senator Corbin doesn't like Opus Dei. I would like to mention a fairly common experience. Nausea can be caused by the air we breathe and the food we eat, but it is sometimes caused by a malfunction in our own bodies. I hope that the cramps suffered by our colleagues will clear up very shortly, for their own benefit as well as that of their neighbours.

Senator Corbin raised a number of questions. Although I feel this is the kind of information that should be obtained in committee, by directing these questions to the regional vicar of Opus Dei and to other witnesses with first-hand knowledge of the Prelature who have the requisite legal competence, I think it would nevertheless be appropriate to give a summary reply.

I obviously agree with the fact that if a general statute allowed the regional vicar of Opus Dei to become a moral person or a corporation, I would never have agreed to introduce this bill. However, the Canada Corporations Act allows a person to be incorporated for business purposes, while the same act does not provide a procedure for persons who want to be incorporated on a non-profit basis. I may add that in any case, there would be the physical person, John Doe, and a moral person distinct from the other one.

Our colleague claims that the Prelature of Opus Dei or its regional vicar had something to hide, and that it wanted to escape controls and inspections. However, Clause 7 of the bill obliges the regional vicar to appoint an auditor who is, by definition, an independent accountant. Furthermore, the general statute, in other words, Part III of the Canada Corporations Act, Section 158, makes companies incorporated by special legislation subject to the same control requirements as any other corporation. So the wording of the bill and the existing legislation completely contradict the comments of Senator Corbin.

Furthermore, the senator pointed out that the bill allows us to control the truth of what is being requested. Could anyone imagine a person occupying a position within the Catholic Church asking to be incorporated as a corporation sole, if that person had anything to hide? Can anybody imagine the regional vicar of Opus Dei submitting to the democratic process if he were not prepared to answer all questions? I think the suggestion is rather far-fetched. In any case, the regional vicar has confirmed he would be delighted to answer all these questions.

[English]

I remind you, honourable senators, that every inquiry has always vindicated Opus Dei. I have quoted some of the conclusions reached by serious inquiries made by the Vatican and the Italian Parliament, and I am sure that any questions raised in the committee will receive a satisfactory reply. Of course, someone might not like the way others put their Catholic beliefs into practice. But what we are looking at is a bill which should be judged according to the laws of our country and not along ideological lines.

The reason for this petition is that the Statutes of the Prelature—that is, its internal law as sanctioned by the Holy See—require that in each country where it operates the Regional Vicar has to obtain a civil personality, always in conformity with the laws of the country. Let me quote from Article 129 of those statutes:

[Translation]

129.1 The Prelature and each of its constituencies must acquire legal status—

129.3 The Prelature or the constituencies referred to in paragraph 1 are accountable for the commitments met by each one and shall also follow faithfully the legitimate laws of the respective regions or countries, acting within the standards set by these laws.

How has this taken place in other countries? To answer some of the questions put by Senator Corbin, I have asked for and obtained complementary information. What the senator and I received was already quite complete. In all the countries where there is an international convention or concordat between the country and the Holy See, the canonical personality of the prelature is recognized in civil law. This is the case, for instance, in Italy, Spain, Portugal and several Latin American countries.

In countries where no such convention exists, it very much depends on the laws of the respective countries, but it is worth noting that in no case has the request of the Regional Vicar, of the Regional Vicarate or of the prelature ever been rejected. The fact that here in Canada the corporation sole exists and serves a number of different possible functions, mainly—though not exclusively—ecclesiastical or religious, does not necessarily mean that we will be establishing a precedent for other countries. Laws are one of the most specific manifestations of a society, and I do not see how what is decided in other countries has much to do with the specific petition we have in front of us.

If I understand parliamentary procedures correctly, I have the impression that we are doing the job of the committee. I am convinced that the legal counsel of the Senate, as well as the legal adviser of the Library of Parliament, could shed some light on this point in front of the committee. The Regional Vicar, as well as his legal advisers, could also address many of these questions.

As I mentioned to honourable senators when I introduced the bill for second reading, the Senate has already incorporated a number of officials and a rather large number of religious bodies of various denominations. These were all granted corporate status even before the Charter of Rights was in effect, and in none of these cases has there been any scrutinising of the religious beliefs and practices of the institutions involved. Not to grant the Regional Vicar of the Opus Dei Prelature corporate status, therefore, would be to set an unwarranted precedent for discriminating against those of any religious persuasion, whether they be Moslem, Jew or Christian. Never before in these chambers has a bona fide religious institution come under such vicious and ferocious attack, and never before in these chambers have we allowed straightforward personal bias to override our collective sense of responsibility.

The question we are left with, honourable senators, is whether we are going to act in accordance with the principle of religious tolerance and liberty enshrined in our Constitution and Charter of Rights, and with the justice, fairness and integrity that has always characterized this house when dealing with such questions in the past.

I trust, and I have no doubt about it, that when the rest of the speeches here have been made, this assembly will allow the interested party, the Vicar General of the Prelature of the Opus Dei, to express his views before the committee. I am aware that I was granted the privilege of replying to the previous comments, and I now leave the floor to others who may wish to speak.

Senator Corbin: Honourable senators, as agreed before Senator Bélisle made his intervention this afternoon, I now propose adjournment of the debate.

On motion of Senator Corbin, debate adjourned.

CANADA-EUROPE PARLIAMENTARY ASSOCIATION

VISIT OF DELEGATION TO FEDERAL REPUBLIC OF GERMANY—
DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Leblanc (Saurel) calling the attention of the Senate to the visit of the Canada-Europe Parliamentary Association delegation to the Federal Republic of Germany, from January 15 to 27, 1987.—(Honourable Senator Leblanc (Saurel)).

Hon. Fernand-E. Leblanc: Honourable senators, I have discussed the possibility of continuing the debate with Senator Grafstein, who is here now. I believe that we should adjourn the debate in his name.

On motion of Senator Leblanc, for Senator Grafstein, debate adjourned.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE—MOTION TO TELEVISION PROCEEDINGS—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

[Senator Bélisle.]

Resuming the debate on the motion, as modified, of the Honourable Senator Frith, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rousseau:

That pool television cameras be permitted in the Senate Chamber for the purpose of recording the proceedings of a Committee of the Whole with respect to its hearings on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to; and

That the proceedings be televised pursuant to the principles and practices governing the broadcasting of the proceedings of the House of Commons, where applicable.—(Honourable Senator Frith).

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I should just like to say a word about the reservations raised by some honourable senators about the presence of rather bulky hardware on the floor of the chamber.

It is my information that this equipment will have to be set up at the beginning of a Senate sitting and be in place during our regular sittings, be in place during the Committee of the Whole, and remain until the sitting is over.

In response to the concern about the general bulkiness of the hardware on the floor, I have asked for general exploration of a way to solve the problem, in other words, to have cameras located in the gallery or anywhere else. If that cannot be done, then both aisles will be blocked during the entire sitting that day. As yet, I have not been furnished with that information, and I think it is quite reasonable for honourable senators to ask for it. Until I have that information, I would ask that the order stand.

Order stands.

DOMESTIC PETROLEUM LIMITED

PROPOSED SALE—REPORT OF ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES COMMITTEE ON EXTENSION OF REPORTING DATE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the sixth report of the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources (extension of reporting date re examination of Dome Petroleum Limited), presented in the Senate on June 23, 1987.

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, I move the adoption of this report.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

REPORT OF NATIONAL FINANCE COMMITTEE ADOPTED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Seventh Report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance (post-secondary education) tabled in the Senate on 25th March, 1987.—(Honourable Senator Frith.)

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I have been asking that this order stand in my name to give someone else an opportunity to speak to it. I have consulted with the chairman and he does not wish to Speak to this matter further. No one else has expressed a wish to speak to it, and therefore I suggest that we consider it to be debated.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m.

CUSTOMS TARIFF AND DUTIES RELIEF ACT

REPORT OF BANKING, TRADE AND COMMERCE COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-69

MONDAY, June 29, 1987

The Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce has the honour to present its

EIGHTEENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of the Bill C-69, An Act to amend the Customs Tariff and the Duties Relief Act, in advance of the said Bill coming before the Senate or any matter relating thereto, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Tuesday, 16th June, 1987, examined the subject-matter of the Bill and now reports as follows:

The Committee heard evidence from Mr. Bill McCloskey, Assistant Director, Tariff Division and Ms. Carol Nelder-Corvari, Tariffs Officer, Tariff Division, Department of Finance.

Bill C-69 will implement the amendments to the Customs Tariff that were tabled by the Minister of Finance with his budget on 18th February, 1987. The amendments can be grouped into four categories.

- 1) Tariff changes sought by private industry.
- 2) Changes stemming from the commitment, made by Canada in the Tokyo round of trade negotiations, to examine "made/not made" tariff items. Tariff rates on items falling within this group are set by administrative decision and can change whenever a product begins or ceases to be produced in Canada. The amendments provided in the Bill stem from recommendations made by the Tariff Board, following an extensive study and across-the-country hearings on this issue.
- 3) Amendments to give statutory effect to the tariff increases imposed by the Government on 6th June, 1986, in response to the imposition by the United States of a 35% tariff on Canadian exports of cedar shakes and shingles. Items affected included Christmas trees, tea in tea bags, asphaltum oil, and diesel motor rail cars. In the budget of last February, the Minister announced that, effective 19th February, 1987, the tariffs on these items would revert to the rates in effect prior to 6th June, 1986.

- 4) Technical amendments to ensure consistency between the English and French versions of the Customs Tariff.

Officials testified that they had received only one intervention in opposition to the measures proposed in the Bill. Skega Canada Ltd., of North Bay, Ontario, a producer of rubber wear products, objects to the amendment to tariff item 61800-1 contained in Schedule I of the Bill, which would increase the rate of duty on compound rubber from zero to 10.3%. The purpose of the amendment is to restore the level of tariff protection that was in existence prior to an administrative re-classification ruling by the Tariff Board.

According to information provided by the officials, the Minister of Finance has concluded that the continued duty-free entry of compounded rubber would have a severe adverse impact on the operations of several domestic rubber producers. The parties which are supportive of the amendment include:

The Rubber Association of Canada, Mississauga, Ontario
American Biltrite (Canada) Ltd., Sherbrooke, Quebec
CVL Products Ltd., Thorold, Ontario
Epton Industries Incorporated, Kitchener, Ontario
Rochevert Incorporated, Valleyfield, Quebec
Viceroy Rubber & Plastics Limited, Toronto, Ontario

Your Committee recommends that the Bill, when examined by the Senate, be favourably considered.

Respectfully submitted,

IAN SINCLAIR
Chairman

THE SENATE

MR. HAROLD A. KING—POSTMASTER—FELICITATIONS ON RETIREMENT

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I should like to pay a special tribute to a long-time employee of the Senate, Mr. Harold A. King, who is retiring today.

Harold King is a native of Ottawa. He joined the Senate, as a page, on his birthday, January 23, 1940. Except for a brief period from 1943 to 1946 when he volunteered for active military service with the Canadian Armed Forces, he has spent a total of 47 years with the Senate.

Mr. King has held a number of positions since joining the Senate, such as messenger, constable with the Protective Service, clerk in Black Rod's office, postal clerk, Assistant Postmaster and, since 1968, Senate Postmaster.

In 1944 he married Adella Mracek of Saskatchewan and subsequently they had six children.

From 1952 to 1964 he was bugle major with the Governor General's Foot Guards.

I think that all senators would join me in wishing him a happy and healthy retirement.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO PRESENT REPORT LATER THIS DAY

Hon. Arthur Tremblay: Honourable senators, it was the intention of the Standing Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology to table at the beginning of the sitting its report on child benefits. We did not expect the Senate to be sitting at ten o'clock this morning, so the required number of copies for distribution in this House is being printed.

I will therefore ask for leave to revert to that item later in the day.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications has the honour to present its

SIXTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the subject-matter of the Bill C-21, Shipping Conferences Exemption

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

ABSENCE OF GOVERNMENT LEADER FROM CHAMBER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, Senator Murray is in cabinet. He will be with us later today. If any senator wishes to ask any questions, I will take them as notice.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I think it would be better to revert to Question Period later, if we do have questions, so that we can put them to Senator Murray when he arrives.

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): I thank honourable senators. In the meantime, I should like to supply the Senate with these delayed answers. I will read an answer if specifically requested to do so; otherwise, I would ask that these answers be taken as read.

NATIONAL STATISTICS COUNCIL

MEMBERSHIP—REGIONAL REPRESENTATION—REQUEST FOR ANSWER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on March 12, 1987, by the Honourable Charles McElman, regarding National Statistics Council—Membership—Regional Representation—Request for Answer.

(The answer follows:)

The Minister responsible for Statistics Canada has undertaken to improve regional representation on the National Statistics Council. The Minister will appoint at least two additional members from Atlantic Canada prior to the next meeting of the Council.

[Senator Langlois.]

FIJI

CURRENT POLITICAL SITUATION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question raised in the Senate on May 26, 1987, by the Honourable John B. Stewart, regarding Fiji—Current Political Situation.

(The answer follows:)

The Secretary of State for External Affairs issued a statement on May 21st following the coup in Fiji. The statement deplored attempts to undermine Fiji's constitution and its parliamentary democracy through force of arms and expressed the hope that all groups in Fiji would seek to shape their nation's future through public discussion and the parliamentary process.

On June 11th, the Governor General of Fiji, who is now directly exercising his executive authority, announced a plan to return Fiji to parliamentary democracy, through a bi-paritisan process of public discussion and consensus building on constitutional reform and on the conditions under which new elections will be held.

On June 24th, the Secretary of State for External Affairs met with the Fiji High Commissioner to Canada and received further details of the Governor General's plan.

Despite the continuation of the state of emergency in Fiji, visitors have not been subject to harassment and there is no evidence to suggest that Canadian or other foreign visitors to Fiji face any unusual threat to their personal safety.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION

REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON PROSPECTIVE NATIONAL FORUM

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question raised in the Senate on May 27, 1987, by the Honourable John B. Stewart, regarding Post-Secondary Education—Request for Progress Report on Prospective National Forum.

(The answer follows:)

The National Forum on Post-secondary Education is scheduled to take place in Saskatoon, Saskatchewan from October 25th through October 28th.

The objective of the National Forum is to explore the challenges and opportunities facing Canada's universities and colleges in preparation for the 21st century.

The National Forum Committee, the "arm's length" body created to plan, organize and run the event, has been hard at work since it was established on March 30th.

Under the chairmanship of Dr. Brian Segal, the Committee has chosen a format that will have a strong emphasis on workshops in order to permit the expression of views by the participants.

It is expected that the Forum will have between 500 and 600 participants chosen by the National Forum Committee. Participants will be attending the National Forum as individuals and not as representatives of organizations.

The National Forum on Post-secondary Education is being co-sponsored by the provinces and the federal government.

ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question raised in the Senate on June 16, 1987 by the Honourable B. Alasdair Graham, seeking an update of figures provided in Order Paper question No. 7.

(The answer follows:)

An update of these figures has been requested and a complete response is expected by the end of the week. In the event that the Senate rises for the summer prior to the completion of the update, the figures will be provided to Senator Graham and tabled upon the return of the Senate.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

STATUS OF AMENDMENTS TO CANADIAN HUMAN RIGHTS ACT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on June 18, 1987, by the Honourable Lorna Marsden, regarding Employment Equity—Status of Amendments to Canadian Human Rights Act.

(The answer follows:)

The Employment Equity Act is in full operation. In fact, by taking into account suggestions by the Canadian Human Rights Commission and others, the Employment Equity Act was amended to provide for the development of employment equity plans, and for the forwarding of employment equity reports to the Canadian Human Rights Commission. The Commission reaffirmed in their recent Annual Report that they will be using the data generated by the Employment Equity Act to increase the representation of women, natives, visible minorities and the disabled in the work force. The pursuit of employment equity was bolstered last week when the Supreme Court of Canada made a very important ruling which confirmed that the Canadian Human Rights tribunals may impose affirmative action programs.

While the Government, of course, appreciates suggestions for improvement, it is important to stress that this Government, which was the first to provide for employment equity, has an effective program for the implementation of employment equity in Canada. The Minister of Justice has given his undertaking to look very carefully at the recommendations and suggestions announced last week by the Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

With respect to the overall review of the Canadian Human Rights Act, it is not possible to say specifically when any amendments will be introduced, but the Government is moving as quickly as possible to complete the review.

ENERGY

DOMESTIC PETROLEUM-AMOCO CANADA TRANSACTION— AVAILABILITY OF DOCUMENTS TO GOVERNMENT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer to a question raised in the Senate on June 18, 1987 by the Honourable John B. Stewart, regarding Energy—Dome Petroleum-Amoco Canada Transaction—Availability of Documents to Government.

Hon. John B. Stewart: Would the Deputy Leader of the Government read out the answer to my question concerning Dome Petroleum?

Senator Doody: Yes, senator. The answer reads as follows:

The Government has not received a copy of the bidding rules set by Dome, nor a copy of each of the three bids made to Dome. It has, however, received a copy of the Arrangement Agreement between Amoco and Dome, which is in the public domain.

The Minister responsible for Investment Canada is not empowered to compare bids in determining the net benefit of a proposed acquisition on Canada. In accordance with the Investment Canada Act, acquisition proposals must be judged on their own merits.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, may I ask a question brought on by the answer? The expression "government" was used, namely, that the government had not received bids. Can I take it that the word "government" applies also to officials of the government rather than members of the government?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, I would assume so; but I will ask for confirmation of that.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

PROPOSED ADVISORY COUNCIL—COMPOSITION, ROLE AND TERMS OF REFERENCE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on June 25, 1987, by the Honourable Dalia Wood, regarding Official Languages—Proposed Advisory Council—Composition, Role and Terms of Reference—Request for Answers.

(The answer follows:)

As the Minister of Justice indicated in his remarks last Thursday, the Official Languages Bill, a strengthened and up-dated version of the 1969 legislation, will restore conformity with constitutional language rights, and will ensure greater linguistic equality of opportunity to all Canadians, regardless of mother tongue or ethnic origin. It also embodies a clear policy thrust of the federal government to advance the status and the use of the official languages in Canadian society and to enhance the vitality of minority language communities throughout Canada.

The Official Languages Bill provides a specific mandate for the Secretary of State to take such measures as he considers appropriate to advance the equality of status and use of English and French in Canadian society and to ensure public consultation in the development of policies and review of programs relating to that advancement.

The Secretary of State has announced that he will be establishing, pursuant to these provisions, a Canadian Council on Official Languages to advise the Government on the promotion of the official languages in Canadian society. The Council will have a broad representation from all segments of Canadian society and is to provide a forum for discussion of major official languages matters. For instance, the Government could seek the advice of the Council on how best to consult and to cooperate with the private and voluntary sectors to ensure that Canadians can participate in both English and French in the many areas of Canadian society touched by these sectors, and receive services from them in both official languages. The Secretary of State has indicated that he will be consulting the minority communities and other interested parties, including the Commissioner of Official Languages, on the Council's mandate and composition.

AVAILABILITY OF DELAYED ANSWERS

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, since these delayed answers will not appear in Debates of the Senate until tomorrow, or whenever the Senate returns, perhaps the Deputy Leader of the Government could have copies made and distributed to those senators involved, because they may want to ask follow-up questions when Senator Murray arrives later today.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Yes.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I am rather disappointed, to say the least, in the number of delayed answers provided by the Deputy Leader of the Government this morning, inasmuch as this may be the last day of sitting before the summer recess.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): There will be some more coming this afternoon. Perhaps yours will be in the next batch.

Senator Olson: That would be helpful; but I draw to the attention of the Deputy Leader of the Government particularly the questions that I have been asking about acreage payments for the 1987 crop year; the undertaking to obtain information on transportation charges with respect to a ruling made by the Federal Regulation Agency in the United States respecting natural gas; and the question which I asked yesterday as to whether or not a number of CN executive positions will be transferred out of Edmonton.

Perhaps the deputy leader will try to provide answers later today, since this may be our last opportunity before the summer recess to question him on these matters.

Senator Doody: I will certainly try again, although I think the premise is rather optimistic in terms of this being our last day.

Senator Argue: He did not come down on either side. He said this "may be" the last day; and you said it may not be.

Senator Doody: I was as cautious as the honourable senator.

ANSWER TO ORDER PAPER QUESTION

NATIVE ECONOMIC PROGRAM

Question No. 16 on the Order Paper—By Honourable Willie Adams

14th April, 1987—Concerning the Native economic program which was established in 1971 and which received a two-year extension as of March 31, 1987 (i) how much money has been allocated to each of the concerned provinces during the past year and could a list of the companies having received funds be provided; and (ii) how does a company qualify for Native economic programs under the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion?

Reply by the Minister of State—Small Businesses and Tourism:

The Native Economic Program which was initiated in 1971 and which received a two-year extension as of March 31, 1987, is a series of special agreements under the Agricultural and Rural Development Act (Special ARDA). In reply to the above question related to Special ARDA and to the other Native economic programs administered by the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion (DRIE), the following information is provided.

(i) Federal funding for the Special ARDA program is not allocated on a provincial or territorial basis, but rather is available for eligible projects regardless of province or territory of origin. Offers of Special ARDA federal funding accepted in each province or territory during fiscal year 1986/87 are as follows ($ million):

British Columbia	8.0
Manitoba	5.7
Northwest Territories	3.9
Saskatchewan	5.0
Yukon	0.8

A list, by province or territory, of establishments which received assistance from the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion, under the Special ARDA program during 1986/87 is attached in Annex A.

(ii) The Department of Regional Industrial Expansion has three program initiatives targeted to Native economic development: the Canada-wide Native Economic Development Program (NEDP), and two series of federal-provincial agreements, Special ARDA available in five jurisdictions, and Northern Development Agreements between Canada and Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Each program initiative has its own set of eligibility criteria which a company must meet in order to qualify for financial assistance. Principal eligibility criteria for each program are attached as Annex B.

PRINCIPAL ELIGIBILITY CRITERIA FOR DRIE PROGRAMS TARGETED TO NATIVE ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

SPECIAL ARDA PRINCIPAL ELIGIBILITY CRITERIA

The following represent general eligibility criteria for common elements of the federal-provincial Special ARDA Agreements in effect in British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Yukon and the Northwest Territories. There are specific modifications to the criteria in the different jurisdictions.

Eligibility

Eligibility criteria require that the project must:

- (i) be located outside metropolitan city limits (except in the Territories where all locations are eligible)
- (ii) provide identifiable earning and employment opportunities for residents of rural areas or the Territories, the majority of which must be available to people of Native ancestry
- (iii) not have started prior to applying for assistance

Eligible Projects

Sectoral criteria require that the project must be for the purposes of:

- (i) establishing, expanding, acquiring or modernizing a commercial business, including related infrastructure
- (ii) developing supplementary or alternative primary producing activities (with some exclusions in Manitoba and Saskatchewan) or improving existing activities
- (iii) social adjustment measures, including special training-related activities

(iv) in remote rural communities in B.C. only, providing services and facilities that will lead to better economic opportunities through means such as electrification, lessening isolation—geographical (e.g. by improving roads or water transport), or cultural (e.g. provision of TV, FM repeater stations). The establishment or improvement of community recreation facilities may also be eligible.

Financial Criteria

Financial criteria, primarily for commercial undertakings, specify that:

- (i) viability must be demonstrated showing positive return on investment or adequate cash flow
- (ii) maximum assistance on capital assets cannot exceed 50 per cent
- (iii) the applicant is required to contribute at least 10 per cent equity on capital costs

NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENTS PRINCIPAL ELIGIBILITY CRITERIA

General eligibility criteria or general requirements of business applicants under the Northern Development Agreements (NDA) are outlined below. There are some modifications to the criteria in the different jurisdictions in which an Agreement is in effect.

Eligibility Criteria

a) For Applicants:

—Any individuals, partnerships, private or public corporations, services, organizations and societies, local or regional groups, resource producers, associations, Métis Settlements (in Alberta), Indian Bands or community-based local organizations located within the boundaries designated under the NDA.

—NDA is a gap-filling or supplementary funding program which does not replace other existing sources of funding. Projects are assessed on the basis of need, and in Manitoba, there is no set percentage required for equity. In Alberta and Saskatchewan, applicants must provide a minimum of 20 per cent equity (10 per cent in remote communities) to the project.

b) For Projects:

—Projects which have a reasonable chance of leading to or enhancing economic activity; provide cost savings to northern development; increase the participation of northern residents in the local economy or improve their access to existing professional and technical employment opportunities; improve regional and economic planning and development capacity; contribute to development, processing and marketing of northern renewable resources; develop local business skills; increase opportunities for stable or permanent employment; or strengthen northern Native community economic networks.

- Projects must be incremental, have distinct start and finish dates, and demonstrate financial viability and sound management.
- Excluded are projects initiated prior to the date a signed application is received, or projects primarily of a recreational or social nature.

NATIVE ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM PRINCIPAL ELIGIBILITY CRITERIA

The criteria governing eligibility to apply for assistance under the Native Economic Development Program (NEDP) vary according to Program Element. There are three Program Elements: Element I, Native Financial and Economic Institutions; Element II, Community Based Economic Development; and, Element III, Business Enterprises and Special Projects.

Eligibility criteria fall within three categories as follows:

- a) eligible applicants,
- b) eligible activities, and
- c) eligible costs.

In addition, applicants approved to receive assistance must comply with the terms of the offer of assistance prior to the actual disbursement of program monies. An outline of eligibility criteria by Program Element follows.

CRIMINAL CODE CANADA EVIDENCE ACT

BILL TO AMEND—SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Nurgitz, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bielish, for the second reading of Bill C-15, An Act to amend the Criminal Code and the Canada Evidence Act.—(Honourable Senator Neiman).

Hon. Joan Neiman: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs was not in a position to table its report on the subject matter of Bill C-15 until last Friday, and I hope that honourable senators have now had an opportunity to read it. I wish to add only a few words to what has already been said during the debate on second reading.

During the course of the pre-study of Bill C-15, the purpose of which is to create new criminal law to deal with prosecution of alleged sexual abusers of children, the committee held 15 public and some private meetings with multiple groups and individual witnesses, from the victims themselves and those who try to help them, to the many others who must deal with the offenders through the judicial process, or try to treat them by medical or psychiatric means.

The committee received some 67 other briefs and letters, including some from those in the offender category; therefore, it had an almost overwhelming amount of material to consider, some quite at variance with other submissions, but all deriving from personal and/or professional experience. You know now that after doing our own work and monitoring the progress of the bill through the other place, during which some helpful amendments were made, the committee is prepared to recommend passage of Bill C-15, although it still has some reservations and concerns. Those have been explained very clearly by previous speakers in this debate. You have heard from Senator Nurgitz, Senator Fairbairn, Senator Frith and Senator Hicks on various matters contained in the bill. I shall not repeat what has already been said. I simply wish to make a few personal comments to reflect the underlying concern—one might say philosophy—with which the Legal and Constitutional Affairs Committee approached the pre-study of Bill C-15.

● (1010)

We are engaged here in making new and additional criminal laws. That brought to my mind a report put out by the Law Reform Commission of Canada in 1976 entitled "Our Criminal Law." Its comments are still germane and valid. The report sets out the principle which should govern the making of criminal law, and it starts out by citing an old proverb, "The more laws, the more offenders." The report urges restraint for that reason. Let me quote a short passage:

—every time we have a law against something, we do so at a cost. That cost is four-fold. Offenders pay through being prosecuted, convicted, punished. Other individuals pay through having their freedom restricted. We all pay through having to foot the bill for law enforcement.

Finally, society pays, in some cases, by wrongly thinking criminal law has solved the problem and by consequently not getting properly to grips with it.

So in my view, and I believe in the view of many others, it is simply not good enough to say that the purpose of criminal law is to punish. Our responsibility as federal legislators extends beyond the mere creation of offences and offenders. The right hand of the federal government must know what the left hand is doing or failing to do. Beyond that, it must know how the provinces are applying the laws it has created, and whether those laws are achieving the purpose for which they were, or should have been, devised—that is, to deal with and, hopefully, to eradicate a social problem.

It is obvious that we are going to do little to get rid of this social cancer of child sexual abuse until we collect and collate a great deal of information not only on the offenders but on the victims and families of both. What kind of people are they? Where do they come from? What factors predispose them to becoming victims or offenders? That is why the committee has urged very strongly that the data base which we understand the Department of Justice now has be broadened and strengthened.

The committee heard from many professionals—medical, psychiatric and social—who are trying to help either the victims or the offenders. Some had a wealth of experience and excellent facilities to aid them. Others were struggling with minimal information and facilities. They all would be aided immeasurably by a cross-fertilization of ideas and information. For that and other reasons the committee also urged that the federal government encourage positively—and I suggest by cash—the establishment of one or more treatment centres charged with the gathering and dissemination of information to organizations and agencies across Canada which are working in the same or similar fields. These further steps have to be regarded as an integral part of an effective justice system.

In closing I should like to quote one more short passage from the report “Our Criminal Law”:

Coping with crime is a two-sided problem for a just society. Crime uncoped with is unjust: to the victim, to potential victims and to all of us. Crime wrongly coped with is also unjust: criminal law—the state against the individual—is always on the cutting edge of the abuse of power. Between these two extremes justice must keep a balance.

The committee tried to keep that balance in mind and to weigh fairly the rights of the victims against the rights of the alleged offenders.

Honourable senators, in view of the extensive pre-study of the subject matter of Bill C-15, the committee does not think it necessary that this bill be referred back to it at the conclusion of second reading and would therefore urge second and third reading of this bill today.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I would like to add a few words to congratulate the Committee on Legal and

[Senator Neiman.]

Constitutional Affairs to which this bill was referred for pre-study, and especially to say that I share the concerns expressed not only in the report, but also in the comments made in the Senate today and yesterday.

I wish to underline two points in particular, first as concerns clause 246.4 which Senators Hicks and Frith have both mentioned. This clause provides the following rule as concerns the need to obtain corroboration of testimony given by a child:

—the judge shall not instruct the jury that it is unsafe to find the accused guilty in the absence of corroboration.

This is a negative prescription and I recall suggesting in the committee that this be changed to say that the judge shall give the necessary instructions in this regard, without making this an official prohibition as is the case now. I believe that this could create all kinds of problems for the judges as concerns the value of evidence.

The second point to which I would like to draw the attention of the Senate is the description of the offence of sexual interference given in section 140: “Every person who, for a sexual purpose, touches, directly or indirectly, with a part of the body or with an object, any part of the body of a person under the age of fourteen years is guilty of an indictable offence and is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years—”

I understand that the intention to commit a sexual offence must be proven. However, honourable senators will easily see, as I do myself, the danger of having such a general provision. If you simply think of how you can show affection for your grand-children, you will realize how very easy it would be for someone to file a complaint and say: I was there, I saw him bounce the child on his knee and caress his hair. This could lead to blackmail. This is why the recommendation of the committee that application of this provision be monitored very closely and efficiently is essential.

I am afraid that, in most of the cases covered by this provision, there will be little opportunity or possibility of proving an offence has taken place, but in others, this provision could be used for blackmail or to create problems for some people.

On the whole, Senator Neiman and myself have already pointed out that the legislator should not try to solve every possible problem.

A few years ago, when I was Minister of Justice for a short period, I had asked for a review of the Criminal Code, which is now being done, mostly to remove everything that should not be in it. I am not sure that work has been completed even yet to meet this objective. I fully understand the purposes of Bill C-15 and I agree with them, but I am not at all certain that they will be met by this bill.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I would like to make a suggestion following the comments made by Senators Flynn and Hicks and myself. We could suggest to the committee that it write to the Department of Justice to ask for a copy of each new interpretation in the cases dealing with corroboration and sexual interference. We could do this regularly as a kind of follow-up on the interpretation of these two points.

• (1020)

[English]

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: I wish to inform the Senate that if Senator Nurgitz speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Nurgitz: Honourable senators, I noticed the nodding approval of Senator Neiman as Senator Frith was raising the question of asking the Minister of Justice to keep us informed of all the judicial interpretations on the two matters raised by Senator Flynn. I take it that will be done.

With respect to those matters raised by Senator Flynn, these were matters that, of course, the committee did take up with the minister. We have received assurances that these will be carefully monitored. I cannot specifically recall whether it was Senator Fairbairn or myself who commented yesterday on the review process, but the minister has also assured us that the four years would not have to elapse, and that there would be an ongoing review of a matter so sensitive as this.

Senator Neiman mentioned that society pays when we add new laws. Unfortunately, there is a problem that has to be dealt with that, regrettably, society has some price to pay for. I am not certain that we have a new problem on our hands. However, it became evident from the evidence that it is a problem that has perhaps been with us for a long time, but is now being reported with more frequency. The old taboos about sex, especially out of the mouths of children, are now, at least in part, being put aside so that we are hearing more of these problems.

Lastly, I want to thank Senator Neiman for her comments with respect to the data gathering, which would be important. This did appear in our evidence. I know, for example, that the Child Abuse Centre in the city that I come from, Winnipeg, has been a national leader in trying to gather and assimilate data with respect to what constitutes abuse. They have been trying to get some uniformity in that gathering system. One might even hope that at some point, with its geographic location, that particular abuse centre in Winnipeg might be chosen as a national centre.

In any event, we commenced pre-study of this bill last November, and I agree with the comments made by Senator Neiman and the previous speakers that there is no need for it to go to committee at this time.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

Senator Frith: Honourable senators, I take it that there is a plan for Royal Assent later this evening.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Yes, arrangements have been made.

Senator Frith: Well, then, it should be read the third time now.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Nathan Nurgitz: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

ENERGY AND NATURAL RESOURCES

SEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED, PRINTED AS APPENDIX AND ADOPTED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. Earl A. Hastings: Honourable senators, the Standing Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources has the honour to present its seventh report, respecting the power to incur special expenses pursuant to procedural guidelines for the financial operation of the Senate committees. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix B, p. 1608.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Hastings: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

VETERANS APPEAL BOARD BILL

SECOND READING

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Bielish, for the second reading of the Bill C-66, An Act to establish the Veterans Appeal Board and to amend other acts in relation thereto.—(Honourable Senator McElman).

Hon. Charles McElman: Honourable senators, I should first like to commend the Honourable Senator Marshall for his lucid and concise explanation of the purpose and objectives of Bill C-66. The principal purpose of the bill is to merge the activities and responsibilities of the existing Pension Review Board and the War Veterans Allowance Board under a new entity to be known as the Veterans Appeal Board.

Senator Marshall has explained why this is desirable, including that it will improve administrative efficiency, expedite further the services provided to veterans and their dependents, and that the savings to be realized by such a combined board are estimated to be some $400,000 during the fiscal year.

● (1030)

The Minister of Veterans Affairs, the ever-popular the Honourable George Hees—himself a distinguished veteran of the Canadian Armed Forces—has assured Parliament that no public servants will be laid off as a result of this amalgamation. Any who may be surplus to the requirements of the new board will be transferred to other duties within the department.

The minister has also stated that the new board will be located in Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, as are the two boards now being replaced. That is a welcome assurance to maritimers.

I should add that the minister has also recently expressed his intention to introduce an omnibus bill in Parliament this fall, the purpose of which will be to bring together the provisions of some 25 or more existing acts that affect veterans and their dependents. That, too, will be welcome legislation.

Honourable senators, both the National Council of Veterans Associations and the Royal Canadian Legion were consulted in the development of Bill C-66 and both organizations have endorsed it. In the other place the spokespersons for all three parties have given enthusiastic support to this bill and collaborated in its speedy passage there.

One must assume that the experienced members of the two boards that will be replaced by this new board will, insofar as possible, be given the opportunity for service with the new board. Yesterday, honourable senators, I asked the sponsor of Bill C-66, Senator Marshall, to make inquiries of the minister or other authority in the department to determine if this is, in fact, the case. He will, I am sure, advise the Senate of that important information when he closes this debate today.

Honourable senators, I support second reading of Bill C-66 and commend it to your favourable consideration. I do not believe that it needs further study in committee, and it is also my opinion that the Senate should approve the third reading of this bill today.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Marshall speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Marshall: —may I, in turn, commend Senator McElman for his lucid and appropriate remarks on Bill C-66.

[Senator McElman.]

As usual, in his keenness in scrutinizing a bill for which he is responsible, he comes up with questions that were not considered previously, even by members of the House of Commons. One such question is with regard to what will happen to those members of the two boards who will not be kept on. As explained in the minister's statement yesterday, the new board will consist of around 14 members whereas the Pension Review Board and the War Veterans Allowance Board combined have 21 members.

In inquiring of the minister's office, I have been informed that it is proposed that any members who are not retained on the new board will, on application, receive appropriate severance which will take note of all factors relating to the member's service and personal situation. It will not be known until after the bill is proclaimed what the actual figures will be, but I have the assurance from the minister that those who are not retained on the board—and it does appear that they will not need 21 members—will be treated in that manner. They will be looked after with the same care that the minister has displayed in looking after veterans.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SHIPPING CONFERENCES EXEMPTION BILL, 1987

SECOND READING

Hon. Heath Macquarrie moved the second reading of Bill C-21, to exempt certain shipping conference practices from the provisions of the Competition Act, to repeal the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act, 1979 and to amend other acts in consequence thereof.

He said: Honourable senators, I regret that I must rise again so soon after another bow as sponsor of a bill. I know that we do not have protection against double jeopardy in this country, which may be a problem for you and for me in that there is sometimes a fulsome sufficiency in this sort of thing.

Honourable senators, we all know that foreign trade is an important source of revenue and employment for Canada. A significant part of this trade is with overseas countries where most of the exported products are carried by sea. Eighty-three per cent of the value of Canadian deep-sea exports, which totalled $25.5 billion by my last figures, were carried by water in 1985. It is in our interest to protect Canadian shippers by encouraging lower shipping costs along with an adequate level of service. Economic and reliable shipping services are essential in maintaining the competitiveness of our exported goods.

Honourable senators, Bill C-21 is yet another step in the government's efforts to encourage greater competition in the marketplace, preceded, as it was, by the introduction of a new National Transportation Act, Bill C-18. Bill C-21 addresses an important aspect of the Canadian economy, the movement of our overseas trade by sea, and is concerned specifically with what is known in the industry as the "liner trade." Please note my technical know-how.

Generally speaking, liner shipping is the carriage of imports and exports by marine shipping companies which offer regular services between specific ports and which carry cargo in containers or in break-bulk form.

The liner trade makes up by tonnage between 10 per cent and 15 per cent of Canada's deep-sea trade. These figures, however, do not adequately reflect the importance of liner shipping to Canada, as low-valued bulk commodities dominate tonnage statistics.

Commodities in the liner trades, in general, consist of the higher-valued finished and semi-finished products. On the basis of value, the liner trades account for about two-thirds of Canada's total deep-sea trade. Of this amount 40 to 60 per cent is carried by conference operators.

● (1040)

The vast majority of these ocean carriers are foreign owned and operated. About half the total number of liner companies operating in Canadian trades have formed what are known as conferences. These are associations of carriers that not only supply the type of liner services which I have already described but also regulate rates, charges and conditions of carriage, and publish a common tariff. Some 34 conferences were operating in Canadian trades at the end of 1986.

The conference system made its first appearance more than 100 years ago in trade between Britain and India, where cut-throat competition began to cause a great deal of instability and unreliability in the import-export business from the viewpoint of shippers, consignees and carriers. It was agreed among them that service regularity, the safe carriage of goods, and price stability would be beneficial to all parties. This agreement eventually led to the establishment of liner conferences. The advantages of the system at that time soon led to its worldwide use.

The conference system has operated in Canada since the turn of the century. The first investigation into their actions was made in 1913, and subsequent inquiries led to the enactment of the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act in 1971, offering both protection for certain conference practices from the provisions of the Combines Investigation Act and controls over their operation. This act was replaced by the Shipping Conferences Exemption Act (1979), which, among other things, requires the filing of agreements, tariffs, surcharges and the standard form of loyalty contracts. It allows the director of investigation and research to inquire into conference operations on his own initiative or upon direction from the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The act regards agreements that have the effect of reducing competition beyond that necessary to ensure rate or service stability to be prejudicial to the public interest.

The white paper entitled "Freedom to Move" advocated a general thrust towards lessening the regulatory burden currently imposed upon the transportation sector of the economy and encouraging greater competition in the marketplace. This included the marine sector and, in particular, shipping conferences.

As was stated in "Freedom to Move", the government accepts that it is neither feasible nor desirable to eliminate the conference system. Our neighbours to the south adopted new legislation in 1984, the U.S. Shipping Act of 1984, which not only accepts the principle of the conference system but also strengthens the immunity of conferences from anti-trust legislation. At the same time, the U.S. act included pro-competitive elements and thus accords with the Canadian policy set out in "Freedom to Move". While anxious to protect the interest of shippers, the government must be mindful of the need for a balanced approach. Radical anti-conference measures could result in unfavourable cargo diversions away from Canadian ports.

Bill C-21 requires a mandatory right of independent action to be written into any conference agreement, giving individual members of the conference the right to provide a service or a rate different from that stated in the tariff published by the conference. A member may take this action after giving notice in writing to other members of the conference. The maximum notice period is to be established by order in council, but conferences are free to establish a shorter notice period. Other members may take the same independent action on or after the effective date of the original action. This will have the effect of keeping rates at competitive levels, but one of its most advantageous points is that the oft complained of lengthy reaction time of conferences to a request for a rate adjustment will become an outdated practice. This will immediately benefit shippers and, in the longer term, the conferences will adjust to the need for faster reaction.

Service contracts, which are confidential contracts where specific quantities of goods are moved at agreed rates over a fixed period of time, will be permitted by the bill between conference members and shippers. These contracts can be between individual conference members and a shipper or between the conference as a whole and a shipper. The conference agreement will establish the terms and conditions respecting the use of service contracts by the conference members. The conference has the discretion to allow independent action with regard to service contracts. Copies of service contracts must be filed with the regulatory agency not later than 30 days after the day on which they become effective. It would perhaps be pertinent at this juncture to point out to all honourable senators that the confidentiality of the contents of the contracts is protected by both limited access to their contents and by constraints on the use of this data.

In addition to allowing for service contracts, the bill retains loyalty or patronage contracts, which have been in use for many years. Loyalty contracts are signed between a shipper and a conference. A shipper may commit a percentage of his goods up to and including 100 per cent to a conference in return for a reduction of up to 15 per cent of the published rate. I bring this to the attention of honourable senators in order to avoid any confusion between service and loyalty contracts. Service contracts are confidential and deal with specific quantities of goods. Loyalty contracts are public, in a standard form, and deal only with percentages of the total goods available for shipment.

Bill C-21 also provides for a new dispute resolution procedure. Complaints made to the regulatory agency may be open to public hearings or decided on the basis of the material filed, but, in either case, the agency must render a decision no later than 120 days after the complaint has been filed, unless the parties involved agree to an extension. This time constraint will ensure speedy resolution of complaints. The director of investigation and research, appointed under the Competition Act, may make complaints, and may also act as an intervenor in cases where complaints are made by other parties. The director is also empowered to carry out an inquiry on his own initiative or on the direction of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. There is an alternative mechanism available to complainants. The existing act identifies the procedures of the National Transportation Act for the resolution of complaints against agreements or practices of conferences and uses the effect on the public interest as the test. The proposed act introduces the investigation of complaints procedure that I have just described as an alternative to the National Transportation Act approach. It is clearly an alternative, however, for once an application has been made under the National Transportation Act, there is no entitlement to file under the new investigation procedure.

It is universally recognized that conferences, like any ocean carrier of general cargo, must be able to quote through rates in their tariff, and they have always been allowed to do so in Canada. A multimodal or through rate is a single rate quoted to transport goods from their actual origin, which may be inland, to their final destination overseas, which may also be inland. While the proposed act allows conferences to set and quote a through rate in its tariff, the actual amounts to be paid by the ocean carrier to the inland carriers in Canada must be decided upon on an individual basis; that is, between one conference member and the inland carrier.

The proposed act exempts conference and interconference agreements from the Competition Act if they conform to the requirements set out in the legislation. This exemption, however, does not apply in a number of situations, which I will enumerate.

First, the exemption does not apply unless the conference or interconference agreement provides the right of independent action to each member.

Second, the exemption does not apply if two or more members of the conference agree to use a vessel in a predatory pricing role, if they refuse to transport goods because the shipper has used a non-conference ship, or if they limit the use by a non-conference ship of a port or other facility.

Third, predatory pricing policies as addressed by paragraph 34(1)(c) of the Competition Act are not exempted by this act.

Fourth, the exemption does not apply where a conference makes a collective agreement with any carrier in Canada for the amount to be paid for the inland transportation of goods for which the conference is charged a through rate.

In order to allow shippers time to react to rate increases, the new act will require conferences to give 30 days' notice in writing of such increases to the regulatory agency and to any designated shipper group whose members may be affected. Similarly, if conferences wish to increase an existing surcharge or impose a new surcharge—surcharges would include bunker surcharges, port congestion surcharges or currency adjustment factors, for example—they must give 14 days' notice in writing to the agency and the designated shipper group likely to be affected.

● (1050)

In summary, honourable senators, the conditions under which conferences may be exempt from the Competition Act will be more precisely circumscribed than at present.

The existing fine of $500 per day will be raised to $1,000 per day, and the time limitation on proceedings has been increased from one year to three years to ensure compliance with the new act.

The sunset clause, as provided for in the current legislation, is not included in Bill C-21. In fact, the new act will remain in force until changed by Parliament. It should be noted that section 266(1) of the new National Transportation Act provides for a comprehensive review of this proposed legislation in 1992.

Several provisions of the proposed act remain substantially the same as in the existing act. They deal with certification of documents and the time limit for their ultimate disposal; the maintenance of offices in Canada by conferences and their obligation to make material publicly available; meetings with designated shipper groups; deposit of security, if required; and the regulation-making powers of the Governor in Council.

In conclusion, honourable senators, I should like to say that it is my belief that the proposed act will provide a more appropriate environment for conference operations in Canada.

I commend this legislation to honourable senators, noting as I do, and saluting most heartily, the excellent work done by Senator Langlois and the Committee on Transport and Communications. They have made a tremendous contribution to the discharge of this legislation. I note also that Senator Langlois, in his report earlier this morning, reported that his committee recommends that the said bill, when examined by the Senate, be favourably considered. I commend the committee for that judgment, and naturally I rejoice in it.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS AND DEPOSIT INSURANCE SYSTEM AMENDMENT BILL

SECOND READING

Hon. Jacques Flynn moved the second reading of Bill C-42, an Act respecting financial institutions and the deposit insurance system.

He said: Honourable senators, this is one more bill that was passed yesterday by the House of Commons and that we have received now at the very last minute. The Bill was tabled on March 3, 1987, but in this case, the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce was given the bill for prior consideration on March 25 of this year.

The committee examined the bill in accordance with the order of reference and tabled its report on May 12. The report is printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate of May 12, 1987.

I would like to explain that in this case, although the bill was delayed, the fact there was this prior consideration and the committee was able to report on the subject of the bill makes our task much easier. It is of course one of the problems with Parliament that the House of Commons waits until the end of a session or rather until the day before the summer recess to pass a series of bills that reach us here at the very last minute. Of course we can decide to sit a little longer, which may happen. However, with the benefit of prior consideration we can dispose of the bill more quickly.

This policy of referring bills to a committee before they reach the Senate, the Hayden formula as it is called, is a very interesting point which the Deputy Leader of the Opposition raised briefly yesterday. Some day I would like to elaborate and clarify a situation which I find rather confusing, if we consider what we heard yesterday.

In any case, I will take the liberty of referring to Bill C-42 on the basis of the committee's report. I do not intend to go into any great detail, for the simple reason that Senator Sinclair, if I am not mistaken, intends to speak to this bill. Since he is Chairman of the Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce and has spent considerable time and effort on this bill, I believe his explanations will be far more useful than any I would be able to give, aside from the general remarks I would like to make about the subject matter of Bill C-42. This is the first in a series of bills that implement the government's policy respecting financial institutions that was proposed in the white paper titled, New Directions for the Financial Sector, published on December 18, 1986.

In passing, Bill C-56, similar to this one, apparently should be coming from the House of Commons any minute now. The debate might deal with both bills, if Senator Sinclair agrees.

So the first matter dealt with in this bill is the establishment of the Office of the Superintendent of Financial Institutions Act. Currently, the Inspector General of Banks monitors banking operations and the Superintendent of Insurance monitors insurance operations.

The bill establishes one office, that of Superintendent of Financial Institutions. The incumbent will combine the responsibilities of the two officials I just mentioned.

Originally, the committee did not think too much of that idea of charging one person with the responsibility for both industries. It was agreed that there is so much interdependence between all financial institutions operating under federal jurisdiction that there is a definite benefit in having one person responsible for all federal financial institutions.

So much so that the bill will establish a coordinating committee composed of senior officials which, shall I say, will assist the Superintendent of Financial Institutions. That committee would include the Superintendent, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, the Chairman of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation and the Deputy Minister of Finance. Those officials form a committee. Of course, up until now there was nothing to prevent them from meeting and consulting. But now that committee is formally established. The bill makes it a responsibility for those people to meet as a committee.

In passing, to help the Superintendent of Financial Institutions act in a very independent way, he is given the status of a separate employer.

There will also be, to assist the superintendent, a private section advisory committee. As to who will sit on that committee, that is a question that will be solved eventually.

The second part of the bill amends the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation Act by clarifying somewhat its objectives which remain identical to the current ones under the Corporation's Act. It includes certain provisions concerning the funding of the Corporation's operations by allowing the Governor in Council to set the applicable insurance premiums upon the Corporation's recommendation.

As we know, that premium was raised last year, further to the ventures you are aware of. The increase, which was to end on April 30, 1987, has been continued by government decision.

It is expected the Corporation's debt will be written off in a few years.

Another point to emphasize is that the maximum borrowing authority of the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation is raised from $1.5 billion to $3 billion.

Finally, concerning co-insurance and common reserved funds, the bill does not include the recommendations made earlier by the committee in this respect. The committee was satisfied with the explanations provided, which made it possible for the committee to recommend that the bill be favourably considered when it comes to us.

Of course there are a number of consequential provisions required to amend the Bank Act, the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, the Cooperative Credit Associations Act, the Loan Companies Act, and so on. All these acts must be amended to be in accordance with the provisions of Bill C-42.

I share the opinion of the committee and recommend that the Senate give favourable consideration to this bill.

● (1100)

[English]

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I compliment Senator Flynn on covering the principles of this bill so well. As he stated, this bill is the first tranche of three arising from the white paper dealing with financial institutions, issued in December last. Honourable senators must recognize that over the years, and with increasing speed, there has been a melding of the work of what is known as the four pillars of financial institutions. These four pillars once stood separate and apart, but more and more they are coming closer together. The recognition of this fact has been before governments not only in Canada but in other countries, and movements to take care of these changes have been instituted in other jurisdictions.

Honourable senators, I must say that this bill poses great difficulty. It consists of about 170 clauses referring to numerous acts, and there is no consolidation available. So, a person looking at the bill has to have some background or knowledge to understand what they are talking about, simply because one cannot pick the bill up and deal with it. Fortunately, government officials and the minister have cooperated with the committee and have made available to it people who are fully familiar with the statutes involved in the amendment and also with the principles governing the new activities. Basically, this first bill deals with the office of regulation. As honourable senators will recall, we have had some rather unfortunate situations develop in financial institutions in Canada, culminating last year in two regional banks going under and a domino effect forcing some of the other smaller schedule A banks into merging and selling assets to schedule B banks. So there was a need for a change in the regulations, and this was taken care of by Bill C-42, in setting up the new office of Superintendent of Financial Institutions.

The committee heard testimony from the superintendent designate, Mr. Mackenzie, and I think everybody in the financial industry welcomes his appointment. He is a man of considerable experience, and I am sure the committee would want you to know that they were impressed with the work that he has undertaken. We compliment the government on having a man of his calibre take on these onerous duties. I really do not think that I need to say too much more in regard to the superintendent and his duties, except to recognize that these institutions are not all of the same culture. There is a very different culture between a merchant bank and a savings bank and between a life insurance company and a loan company. Therefore, there is now the ability—and I think rightfully—to appoint senior people who are specialists to assist the superintendent in dealing with banks, trust and loan companies or insurance companies. As you can understand, actuarial experience is very necessary in dealing with insurance companies, but is not required in understanding merchant banking or commercial banking. Also, the government has wisely granted the ability to pay people with expertise sufficient salaries to attract the necessary talent so that this organization, under the Superintendent of Financial Institutions, has separate employment status.

Honourable senators, I now turn to deposit insurance, which is the second part of the bill. Here I think the committee did have some problems with some of the aspects. As honourable senators will know, the powers have been extended. This is all to the good, because, through the problems that have developed with regard to trust companies and banks, it has been shown that the ability of the CDIC to take appropriate action was not available under the existing law. That, I think, has now been well taken care of.

However, where we run into some problems is with respect to how the deficit was built up. At the end of last year the deficit was some $1.2 billion. This deficit had accumulated over the years, but grew effectively in the last few years when regional problems with respect to economic matters surfaced and created problems in the trust industry and in the banks. These are deposit-taking institutions.

When the deposit insurance was first set up, it covered only deposits up to $20,000, and the amount of the premium was one-thirtieth of 1 per cent of deposits. Because of the problems that arose, particularly in Ontario, and the impact that these had on depositors, the $20,000 was raised to $60,000 and made retroactive. There was, consequently, a rapid increase in the deficit, and the government then introduced a higher premium rate. The rate went from one-thirtieth of 1 per cent to one-tenth of 1 per cent.

Under this bill the CDIC has the right, through the minister, to increase that premium to one-sixth of 1 per cent. Honourable senators, we are talking about extremely large numbers here. When you make a change such as that, one-thirtieth to one-tenth or one-sixth, the impact on deposit-taking institutions would be very great, indeed. There are hundreds of millions of dollars involved. However, it was stated to the committee, and recorded in our report, that unless there are some unusually troubling factors over the next few years, the deficit of $1.2 billion will be extinguished by the continuation of the one-tenth of 1 per cent premium through the year 1994.

A problem that came to the attention of the Senate, and has been in the minds of others, is the position of the government with regard to taking up part of the deficit. A number of organizations that came before the committee took the position that as the government had changed the rules, had exceeded the limits, and had taken certain actions, the government should fund part of the deficit. One example was that with regard to the two western banks that became insolvent between the end of April 1985 and the winding-up date, in the Canadian Commercial Bank alone the amount of deposits that were covered rose by some $32.7 million; an increase that the bankers said could be attributed to statements made by the government that these banks were sound. The head of the CDIC did not accept those numbers. He said they were fanciful and hypothetical, and for that reason the government should not, in his opinion, take them up.

With respect to the other point arising out of the Seaway and Crown Trust affairs in Ontario, he said that really the government did the right thing; that the deficit certainly went up due to the increase from $20,000 to $60,000 in the short term. However, he said it was necessary for them to pay off all depositors, because the intention was to have a work-out or to have an agency agreement rather than a liquidation. He told the committee that it was the view of the experts in the CDIC that the effect of the work-out has been more beneficial than if they had adopted the liquidation process.

The committee certainly agrees that under circumstances of financial difficulty, work-outs are generally better than liquidations, particularly in the hands of competent people. However, the committee does feel that the officials handling the work-out could make available to others some of the figures and results, and so on, in order to give some assurance that the action taken was the proper one. The committee also impressed upon Mr. McKinley of the CDIC that that was a necessary function if he intended to use work-outs or agency agreements in these circumstances.

Honourable senators, the committee ran into some problems with regard to CDIC on the question of co-insurance or pools. Honourable senators will remember that this issue of co-insurance has been before regulatory bodies and before the government on a number of occasions. Co-insurance, of course, means that the depositor takes the risk up to a certain level or that the government's percentage of coverage declines after a certain level is reached.

The committee itself was not of a single mind in regard to this matter. The reason for that is that it was felt that some sophistication was required even to read the financial statements of financial companies, and that the average person might perhaps be taken in by the outward trappings of those financial institutions—in other words, the Taj Mahals that they build; the fancy marble trimmings around their buildings. I always think of Greymac and how wonderful the building looked and how marvellously polished was the brass outside while they were rapidly going bankrupt. It was felt by some members of the committee that because of that inability or lack of sophistication, there should not be co-insurance, certainly in respect of a deductibility at the lower end. There was certainly no unanimity in regard to a declining coverage in the higher amounts. However, the committee felt it should be noted that where there was a flat premium—and that is what we have here; a flat premium which is now one-tenth of 1 per cent of all deposits—and there is no risk-based premiums, that you have a characteristic that increases risk.

• (1120)

It enables a person or a company to extend offers where the margins do not really support the deposit. This was forcibly pointed out by the chairman of the Economic Council of Canada. In part, the government has recognized this problem of flat premiums increasing risk. Therefore, for the first time, there is provision in this bill that would allow the CDIC, in certain cases, to charge surcharge premiums where they were not happy with the way the organization was carrying out its functions, one of which would be in regard to paying excessive amounts for deposits. That was something that caused problems with the Commercial Bank, the Northland Bank and Pioneer Trust.

However, when the committee was looking at the green paper, and over the months, it has been concerned with risk-related premiums and with risk-related capital requirements. They have been faced with this problem in Britain and have introduced a proposal of having risk-related capital requirements. This has just recently been adopted in the U.K.

When we discussed this with the minister, he acknowledged that this was perhaps the way to go, and that it would improve SROs, self-regulatory organizations, in the banks, the trust companies and the loan companies. He has undertaken to look at these types of risk relations and see if something can be worked out.

For over a year there has been a necessity to appoint outside people to the CDIC board. That has not been done. Unfortunately, we cannot put our finger on the reason. When the minister was before the committee, he said that he expected these appointments to be made within the next few weeks. That is some months ago, and, as far as I know, they have not been appointed yet. It must be very difficult to meet the requirements, but I do not see why they are having so much trouble. Indeed, the government may be in breach of their own statute by not appointing them. That could perhaps cause problems in the future.

Therefore, we can only hope, honourable senators, that the requirements of the statute will met by the government very shortly.

Honourable senators, as Senator Flynn has indicated, this is only one bill of two that have been passed in the other place. This is the only one that is before us at the present time. It does have a companion bill, which is Bill C-56, which may be before us later today; I do not know about that.

In any event, the committee received full cooperation from everyone who was knowledgeable, from the minister, from the officials, from the people of interest. We recommend that this bill receive your favourable consideration.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, if Senator Flynn speaks now, his speech will have the effect of concluding the debate on the motion for second reading.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I simply want to thank Senator Sinclair for his contribution. As I indicated earlier, I believe he has to be the most competent among us to discuss these problems.

The only question I would like to ask him is whether he agrees that this bill need not be referred again to his Banking, Trade and Commerce committee after the second reading stage?

[English]

Senator Sinclair: I certainly agree with that.

[Translation]

Senator Flynn: So I recommend adoption on second reading and, if the Senate agrees, I will move third reading later this day.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Jacques Flynn: With leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-22

FOURTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

Leave having been given to proceed to Order No. 7.

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion for the adoption of the Fourth Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the subject matter of Bill C-22, An Act to amend the Patent Act and to provide for certain matters in relation thereto (hiring of staff), presented in the Senate on 29th June, 1987.—(Honourable Senator Phillips).

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, yesterday, when I asked for the adjournment, it was anticipated that Senator Murray might wish to speak on this order. However, he has a very hectic schedule today, and therefore I will ask a couple of basic questions.

The first question is: What are the duties of the counsel? The second question is: What are the basic qualifications being sought?

With that information we would be prepared to grant the motion in the anticipation that it will speed up the benefits of Bill C-22.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, in the absence of our chairman, who, unfortunately, is not able to be with us today, I am pleased to respond to the questions raised by Senator Phillips.

The first question asked was: What are the duties of the counsel? I would suggest to you that the duties would be what would normally be expected of a legal adviser to a committee. We are looking at a complicated bill. We are looking at some possible amendments. We are looking at all the legal implications that are involved in such changes that may possibly be made. We require the services of someone who would be experienced in this line and, hopefully, would have the ability to understand the industry.

I am now getting into your second question. We are looking for someone who would be legally qualified to handle whatever the committee requires in the way of writing, in the way of drafting, in the way of advice to a committee. I would guess it would be very similar to the kind of qualifications that we would look for in a legal representative for any committee. My friend, Senator Flynn, is shaking his head again. I do not know why every time I stand up I hear Senator Flynn shaking his head. I said, I hear it. I really did not mean it quite that way.

Senator Flynn: Full of wind.

Senator Buckwold: But in any case—

Senator Frith: This is no time for confession, Jacques!

Senator Buckwold: In any case, Senator Phillips, I hope that that brief explanation is an indication of the fact that we do require a professional, trained in this field.

Senator Flynn: We do require another committee.

Senator Buckwold: That could be, in due course.

● (1130)

Senator Flynn: We will be able to do your job; let someone else do it!

Senator Buckwold: We are glad to listen to Senator Flynn, as we always do, for his advice.

Senator Frith: Speak for yourself!

Senator Flynn: I would not want you to join in with him.

Senator Frith: I know that you would be disappointed if I did.

Senator Flynn: Stay that way.

Senator Petten: He would not want to disappoint you, Senator Flynn.

Senator Buckwold: I enjoy it when Senator Flynn shakes his head; I can almost hear it over here.

Senator Stanbury: You mean it rattles.

Senator Buckwold: It rattles, yes.

Honourable senators, I hope that this request, which requires no additional funding for the committee—the funds are there—will be granted, and we can then get on with the work of this important committee.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE—ORDER STANDS

On the Order:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, can this order stand? I would like to confer with the chairman.

Order stands.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, can we take advantage of the lull at this time to give Senator Balfour an opportunity to present an item that he has on the order paper? He and Senator Grafstein have agreed to speak briefly to this item and get it cleared up this morning rather than this afternoon, when they have other engagements.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

CANADA-UNITED STATES INTER-PARLIAMENTARY GROUP

TWENTY-EIGHTH MEETING HELD AT VANCOUVER, BRITISH COLUMBIA

Leave having been given to proceed to Inquiries:

Hon. James Balfour rose, pursuant to notice of Monday, June 29, 1987:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the Twenty-eighth Meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-parliamentary Group, held at Vancouver, British Columbia, from June 4 to 8, 1987, and to the Report of the said Meeting.

He said: Honourable senators, I have the honour, as the co-chairman of the Canadian delegation, to table in the Senate, in both official languages, the interim report of the meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-parliamentary Group that took place in Vancouver earlier this month, from June 4 to 8, 1987.

For many years it has been the custom of the Senate to have a full report of the Canada-United States Inter-parliamentary Group tabled and printed in the Debates of the Senate, and the same procedure will be followed for this year's meeting as well. However, there is usually a considerable delay in the process, since it has been customary to circulate a draft of the full report first to all the Canadian participants for their approval. The text will, therefore, not be available until the autumn.

In the meantime, several Senate participants considered that some of the issues discussed at this year's meeting with the American Congress were of such current interest that before the summer recess I should table a brief interim report giving the highlights of the valuable exchange of views which took place.

As senators are no doubt aware, the role of certain congressional figures will be of critical importance in the process of U.S. ratification of a Canada-U.S. trade agreement, if and when a draft agreement is drawn up. This year the U.S. delegation to the Vancouver meeting was of high calibre and included a couple of these key members of the House of Commons Ways and Means Committee, whose approval will be necessary for the agreement to go ahead. Honourable senators will be interested, I think, in the summary of their remarks on this point.

Both in committee and in the plenary, the discussions on trade issues were informed and at times vigorous. In plenary, in addition to looking broadly at the prospects of a bilateral free trade agreement, there was a discussion of the implications of the bilateral relationship on Canada's cultural sovereignty.

As senators will see from this interim report, the agenda for meetings, divided into three committees, covers the gamut of Canada-U.S. relations. Canadian delegates, including an able Senate contingent, aired Canadian concerns on a variety of issues, including countervail, steel, corn, softwood lumber and film distribution; on energy and defence issues, such as the proposed U.S. oil import tax and the recent FERC decision on gas pricing; and on environmental issues, including acid rain and other trans-boundary and fisheries problems. There is no doubt that this is the most important inter-parliamentary relationship of the Canadian Parliament.

This year was the twenty-seventh consecutive meeting of this group, and honourable senators will be interested to know that its early success owes a great deal to a former member of this assembly, the late Senator Grattan O'Leary, who, with his friend, Senator George Aiken from Vermont, could be considered fathers of this important organization.

These annual meetings provide Canada with a unique opportunity for getting Canadian viewpoints and concerns directly to U.S. Congressmen in a way that cannot be duplicated by officials, no matter how skilful and assiduous.

Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, I ask that the Report of the Twenty-Eighth Meeting of the Canada-United States Inter-parliamentary Group be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see Appendix "C", p. 1610.)

Hon. Jeremiah S. Grafstein: Honourable senators, I was pleased to be a member of the Twenty-Seventh Annual Meeting of the Canada-United States Parliamentary Group which met this June in Vancouver.

To meet American counterparts from the Senate and the House of Representatives and to exchange ideas on current public policy and priorities of our respective public agendas is always a stimulating challenge. We seem to be looking, however, at opposite ends of a telescope. Sometimes one feels as if trapped in a surrealist painting by Salvador Dali.

While we Canadians were convulsed by issues of gas export pricing, film distribution in Canada, softwood lumber and Arctic sovereignty, the Americans arrived fresh from congressional committee discussions on the missile attack on the U.S.S. Stark in the Persian Gulf and the continuing saga of Irangate. Many members were delayed because of their attendance at these hearings. Americans are debating the role of their President and Congress, their economic future, compounded by their stupendous budget deficit, the impact of their debt overlay on the free world, and the continuing Samurai-like attacks and counterattacks on their corrosive trade deficit.

To cause Americans to focus on Canada-U.S. relations at any time is an act of optimism over experience. The baroque American mind now, however, has become concentrated on international trade.

I can report that the Americans in Congress are slowly beginning to concentrate on Canada-U.S. negotiations. While obsessed with local constituency trade protective measures, trade, indeed, will be an issue in the run-up to the American presidential elections commencing after Labour Day this year. But American realism is concentrating the American mind as the velocity of the Canada-U.S. fast-track negotiation reaches a critical period later this fall.

Some American congressmen were pessimistic that Congress could grapple with a comprehensive trade bill in the available time period. Some were pessimistic that if the time period were too short before a trade agreement was open for debate, a congressional delay would be granted. However, American lawmakers are always passionate in pressing their local interests, provocative in promotion of their national positions, provocative in applying their global responsibilities, and at all times are united and programmed to propel their manifest destiny.

We did not, honourable senators, meet the stereotype of the "ugly American." Rather, we met articulate, well-briefed, well-travelled, skilled, public-spirited legislators who, while declaiming their global goals, continued to act in their local interests. This meeting went beyond the niceties and developed into a genuine exchange of viewpoints. Under the excellent chairmanship of Patrick Nowlan and our colleague, Senator Balfour, supported by the excellent staff and briefing by departmental officials, the Canadian delegation was well prepared, vigorous and even eloquent.

• (1140)

The list of issues, as outlined in the report tabled by Senator Balfour, was extensive and wide-ranging. Let me touch briefly on a few of the issues, two of which I was asked to present.

On Arctic sovereignty, we pointed out that there was a strong consensus in Canada to exercise full sovereignty over our historic internal waters of the Arctic archipelago. Canada, with our rights well founded in law and fact, is now prepared to have its position affirmed before the International Court of Justice. Legislation defining the straight base lines for these internal waters became effective January 1, 1986, and Canada's exercise of sovereignty is in no way a precedent that would justify interference with international navigation in other parts of the world, precisely because Canada's rights to the Canadian archipelago are unique in that it is unlike any other archipelago in the world in geographic terms. This Arctic area has been used and occupied by Canadian Inuit from time immemorial, and it has not customarily been used for international navigation. Thus, the Northwest Passage does not constitute an international strait.

Canada, we indicated, would prefer cooperation rather than confrontation. We are united in our concern that our sovereignty, security, preservation of the environment and the welfare of the Inuit in the Arctic continue. The Canadian position, while formally questioned by Americans, was informally well received and well supported. We believe we made the point that Americans should seek cooperative arrangements rather than crudely breaching what all Canadians consider a clear case of our sovereignty.

On cultural sovereignty, the plenary dealt with the Honourable Flora MacDonald's recent film policy to separate the Canadian marketplace from the American marketplace, and to allow Canadian film producers and film directors an opportunity to establish viable businesses within our own domestic marketplace here in Canada. Less than 10 per cent of the films distributed, produced and exhibited in Canada are Canadian. Yet, surprisingly, there was vitriolic objection to any modest step to repatriate even a small portion of our own domestic marketplace by American film lobbyists.

We argued that Americans had a similar situation with respect to books by American authors at the turn of the century that were substantially published in England. At that time Congress placed a provision in their Copyright Act that provided that American writers, to be protected in their copyright, must be published by American publishing firms. Sixty years later that protective provision in the U.S. Copyright Act was deleted, because, by that time, American publishing firms had become large and healthy having effectively repatriated their domestic marketplace. Now the overwhelming majority of books read by Americans are written and published by Americans in America.

We argued that in Canada our cultural industries, such as films, do not even have a level playing field in Canada. Canadians cannot get on our own field in our own country to play the game. Again the majority of the American delegation was informally sympathetic to our viewpoint. One American legislator even went so far as to point out jocularly that, to be fair, Canada should be given at least 60 years to repatriate our marketplace, as the Americans did. However, we were reminded that fairness in America is no equivalent to any dilution, however minor, to a perceived American interest, and that hell hath no fury like an American lobbyist deterred.

On acid rain, the Americans used their familiar technique of the sword and the shield. While sympathetic, they hid behind their divided jurisdictions, which exist between the two houses of Congress and the President, which act as a collective shield against any coherent continental policy that would protect Canadians or Americans against acid rain in the short run.

Finally, a small item placed on the agenda by the Americans illustrates the American competitive spirit at work. The Japanese have demonstrated recently that they are about to become world leaders in the development of superconductor technology in such applied areas as nuclear medicine and electronic technology. In America this has provoked a publicly perceived gap in high tech. In order to catch up by the year 2,000, America is prepared to build a super conducting supercollider called SSC. The estimate for this major project is approximately $4 billion to $5 billion.

The Americans have demonstrated the vibrancy and imagination of their economic model. While we Canadians are obscenely concerned about supporting General Motors at Ste. Therese, Americans are looking to the future for breakthroughs in high tech and are prepared to put their money where their minds are.

Walt Whitman, the great American poet, wrote a beautiful poem called "I Hear America Singing". At this meeting we heard American legislators, we listened to their words, we listened to their music, and I came away believing that Canadians must be more coherent in our national policies, more united in our national objectives, more concentrated in our national priorities if we are not to be drowned out by the cacophony of the grand American chorus.

One final footnote, honourable senators. Our American colleagues, while not wishing to interfere with or intrude on domestic Canadian affairs, were informally most interested and bemused by Canada's new constitutional model. Read, I was advised, read the deliberations of the Grand Convention held in Philadelphia 200 years ago in 1787 that led to the new U.S. Constitution to see how Americans dealt with their national idea of "a more perfect economic union." Sometimes, honourable senators, sometimes American advice should be heeded!

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: As no other honourable senator wishes to participate in the debate, this inquiry is considered debated.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I propose that the Senate adjourn now until 2 o'clock this afternoon.

I understand that as the next item of business on the order paper we will be going into Committee of the Whole, and it may be just as well for us to break before that and start with Senator Forsey at 2 o'clock this afternoon.

The Senate adjourned until 2 p.m.

---

At 2 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD AND AGREED TEXTS—
CONSIDERATION IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE CONTINUED

On the Order:

The Senate again in Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to.

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake Constitutional Accord and texts subsequently agreed to, the Honourable Senator Gildas L. Molgat in the Chair.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, it was agreed that we would meet again to proceed with questioning of the Honourable Eugene Forsey. If you are prepared to proceed now, we will invite Senator Forsey to join us.

Senator Frith: While we are waiting, honourable senators, I should explain that we hope the next time we resolve into Committee of the Whole on the Meech Lake accord to try to place the table in a different position. We all know that the present position is not satisfactory. The suggestion is that the table be placed to the left of the Chair, but the problem is that some wiring has to be done in order to make that possible. I do not want honourable senators to think that we have ignored our common concern over the placement of the table.

Pursuant to Order adopted on June 18, 1987, the Honourable Eugene Forsey was escorted to a seat in the Senate Chamber.

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Forsey, for joining us again today. My apologies for your having had to wait on a couple of previous occasions when we thought that we would proceed to Committee of the Whole. Having been in this place for many years yourself, I am sure that you realize that our schedules are not exactly predictable at times.

The purpose this afternoon is to proceed to questioning of Senator Forsey. I believe it was agreed by the steering committee that we would start off with someone from the opposition, followed by someone from the government. Then senators will follow at random as I see hands raised, but I will attempt to ensure that there is balance.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, Senator Stewart will begin for the this side.

The Chairman: I recognize Senator Stewart.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My first question, honourable senators, relates to the proposed new section 2 of the Constitution Act. It relates to the way paragraph 2.(1)(b) is to be read when we take into account subsection (4). What does proposed subsection 2.(4) mean when read in the light of the overriding rule that the entire Constitution of Canada, with the exception of those sections specified in section 16 of this Constitution amendment, is to be interpreted in a manner consistent with the recognition that Quebec constitutes, within Canada, a distinct society?

Hon. Eugene Forsey: Senator Stewart, I tried to make clear the other day my view that subsection 2.(4) does not provide an adequate safeguard against the difficulties which might arise from the provisions of section 2, subsection (3). I do not know that I can make it any clearer. It seems to me that there is the possibility that the opening words there:

The Constitution Act, 1867 is amended by adding thereto, immediately after section 1 thereof, the following section:

“2.(1) The Constitution of Canada shall be interpreted—represents the kind of possibility that I referred to the other day and that subsection (4) does not adequately protect us from the consequences.

I do not know whether I have really seized the purport of your question and given an adequate answer, but I tried to make it clear the other day. Perhaps you had better have another shot and see if you can straighten me out.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Let me put it this way: Would it be unreasonable for a judge to decide that subsection (4) does not change in any way the list of powers, et cetera, of Parliament, but that in the future there is to be a new rule of interpretation, an overriding rule of interpretation, when cases involving conflict between the powers of the Parliament of Canada and the powers of a provincial legislature take place? I refer to the case when that conflict is between Canada and the authorities in Quebec. That rule would not apply, of course, in a case involving Canada and Ontario, let us say.

Dr. Forsey: Yes, I would think there is the possibility of a complete overriding there, especially in view of the provisions of section 16.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): With respect to the word “society”, where will the court look for guidance in deciding what is meant by “society” in this new section? What do you think, on the basis of that kind of guidance, the courts will decide the word “society” means? Clearly this rule of interpretation refers to far more than language, which is dealt with adequately in the new section 2.(1)(a).

Dr. Forsey: Yes, clearly it deals with far more than language, especially, again, taken in conjunction with section 16. The meaning of the term “society” puzzles me. I am afraid I simply do not know enough law to guess what the courts would take that to mean. I am afraid that question, as to the actual construction the courts would put on the word “society”, would have to be addressed to somebody with more knowledge of law than I possess.

• (1410)

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Honourable senators, I have a further question. It is short, but I would like to give a little background for it. Much of the important litigation concerning the Constitution Act of 1867 has centred on section 92(13), the “Property and Civil Rights in the Province” clause. We know that in 1914 Parliament enacted the War Measures Act, which authorized in certain circumstances, among other things, the “appropriation, control, forfeiture and disposition of property and of the use thereof”. That statute was upheld by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in 1923 in the Fort Frances case, where the committee advised that property and civil rights in the province in emergencies may have aspects:

... by reason of the special circumstances of the national emergency which concern nothing short of the peace, order and good government of Canada as a whole.

The War Measures Act is still on the books; but last Friday the Minister of National Defence introduced in the House of Commons a bill for a new Emergencies Act, which will provide the Government of Canada with exceptional powers to deal with national emergencies at four different levels.

Even at the lowest level of emergency, the new act will authorize the Governor in Council to make orders in council with respect to:

the requisition, use or disposition of property.

Now, given the rule that hereafter, in the case of Quebec, the provision “Property and Civil Rights in the Province” is to be interpreted in a new way—that is, as property and civil rights in a distinct society—is it possible, Senator Forsey, that an order under this proposed new Emergencies Act would be found valid for Ontario or New Brunswick but invalid for Quebec?

Dr. Forsey: In my opinion, yes, perfectly possible.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): In other words, property and civil rights in the province will be a much more powerful assignment of power in the case of Quebec than for Ontario and New Brunswick.

Dr. Forsey: Yes, or any other province.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Mr. Chairman, I have one further question, if I may. As you said on Friday, Senator Forsey, up to the present the spending power has been used to help provincial governments participate in shared-cost programs with objectives and standards defined by the Parliament of Canada.

Under the proposed new section 106A, where a new shared-cost program is established by the Government of Canada, a province that chooses not to participate is to receive reasonable compensation if "it carries on a program or initiative that is compatible with the national objectives."

In contrast, as you pointed out, to proposed new section 95B, dealing with national standards and objectives relating to immigration or aliens, the proposed new section 106A makes no reference to the Parliament of Canada.

It has been argued that the national purposes or national objectives—whichever term you wish to use—in areas under exclusive provincial jurisdiction can only mean the sum of provincial purposes or objectives. That position was asserted by no less a person than the present Attorney General of Nova Scotia. In 1984 Mr. Donahoe appeared before the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance, which was then dealing with a bill concerning federal-provincial financial arrangements with regard to education. He said:

Given the provincial jurisdiction in the field of education, provincial ministers of education would contend that "national purposes" can be only understood in terms of the sum of provincial purposes.

Later he went on to say:

What deeply concerns us is a possible interpretation of this clause, which would render the term "national purposes" synonymous with "federal government purposes".

So there we have a very clear definition—a provincialist definition—of the term "national purposes" or, alternatively, "national objectives." My question is this: Is the omission from section 106A of any reference to the Parliament of Canada as defining the objectives of new shared-cost programs consistent with the view stated by the present Attorney General of Nova Scotia—namely, that in these areas "national purposes" or "national objectives"—whichever term one wishes to use—can be understood only in terms of the sum of provincial objectives?

Dr. Forsey: It seems to me that it might be—although, of course, the Meech Lake accord does say "the Government of Canada". For reasons that I explained the other day, I don't think that is adequate. I cannot believe that the definition of "national purposes", as simply the sum of provincial purposes, in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, is adequate at all. I should reject the theory put forward by the present Attorney General of Nova Scotia.

Incidentally, even in connection with education, I think it fails to hold water, because, as two very distinguished constitutional lawyers have pointed out—the late Alex Correy of Queen's and Senator Hicks of this chamber—section 93 of the act of 1867 says, "in and for each province" the legislature shall exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject to—and then come provisions for separate schools.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): But, Senator Forsey, let us not get into the problem of deciding how much of education is provincial and how much might be federal. Some of it is provincial, clearly.

Dr. Forsey: Yes.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): In that area which is clearly provincial, would a definition of national purposes or objectives, as the sum of the purposes of the provincial governments, be a reasonable definition?

Dr. Forsey: No, I don't think so.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): You would not think so?

Dr. Forsey: No.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): In other words, you disagree emphatically with the present Attorney General of Nova Scotia?

Dr. Forsey: Yes—very rash of me, perhaps, but I do.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): But at least that is a definition which could reasonably be put forward by a proponent of the provincial viewpoint. After all, in 1867 they did assign certain things exclusively to provincial jurisdiction.

Dr. Forsey: Yes, but they also assigned certain things to the jurisdiction of the central Parliament and government, and Sir John A. Macdonald's cardinal principle was the general government and legislature for general purposes and local governments and legislatures for local purposes; and there is no doubt at all in my mind that if Sir John had been confronted with Mr. Donahoe's proposal, he would at least have laughed at it. I think he would have rejected it completely.

That is, of course, not decisive; but it seems to me that if you're talking about expenditures by the Parliament of Canada, the Parliament of Canada has the right to say, "We are going to make these expenditures for certain purposes and we decide what those purposes are; we attach the conditions to the expenditure of our money."

I don't see how they can abdicate in favour of a sum of provincial purposes in any jurisdiction, even if the jurisdiction is completely provincial. If they are going to have a spending power at all and use it, it seems to me that the Parliament of Canada must say, "on certain conditions."

Now, obviously if there are certain conditions which it might try to impose which would be intolerable, they would have to be rejected. But, in fact, we know that in the shared-cost programs various conditions have been laid down which have been adhered to, and which I think have passed without serious question—the extra billing provision, for example, in the Canada Health Act.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Certainly that has been the pattern in certain cases; but there is a notable case, namely, education, where the Parliament of Canada provides large sums of money to provincial governments and the Government of Canada and the Parliament of Canada have not been successful in establishing the national purposes or the national objectives. They have accepted the "national purposes" or the "national objectives" as defined by Mr. Donahoe, who in 1984 was speaking as the Chairman of the Council of Ministers of Education for Canada. It seems to me that this interpretation is not one that ought to be dismissed out of hand. It is one which has applied to a major part of the transfers to the provinces for many years.

● (1420)

Dr. Forsey: Unquestionably Parliament can make unconditional grants to anybody it wants to.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): Which on this interpretation will have a constitutional blessing or imprimatur?

Dr. Forsey: I think that Parliament has the power now either to make conditional grants or unconditional grants. It has power to do both.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): But in the case of shared-cost programs, using this interpretation of "national objectives," whereas up to now Parliament could say, "We will not give you any money unless you meet our objectives," a province hereafter will be able to say, "We have our own initiative here. It does not conform with what you say are the standards, but that is not required by the Constitution in order for us to qualify for our money."

Dr. Forsey: Quite so, subject, of course, to the interpretation put on the word "compatible" and subject also to the interpretation put upon the word "initiatives". What exactly constitutes an "initiative," which is "compatible"—a question mark again—with "national objectives"—a question mark again. And there is also the possibility that the "national objectives" might be set by that ineffable body, The Conference of First Ministers. I cannot refrain from drawing attention to a very curious thing in the accord which I at first took to be simply a misprint caused by what I believe is called the prevalence in the post-literate age of computers and word processors, and so forth. In the second "whereas" I believe it says that this will bring Quebec into the Constitutional Councils—c-o-u-n-c-i-l-s—of Canada. When I saw that I thought, of course, that they meant c-o-u-n-s-e-l-s. But after hearing the exaltation of the Conference of First Ministers, I began to ask myself whether, in fact, they are speaking of a new entity here—the Constitutional Councils of Canada. It seems to me that it is possible that with the magnification of the Conference of First Ministers, we might have the first ministers taking upon themselves the task of defining what the "national objectives" are. Of course, the text says, "The Government of Canada." It seems to me that it is a mass of obscurities and ambiguities.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): The section speaks only of a national shared-cost program that is established by the Government of Canada. It does not say in any place that the Parliament of Canada or the Government of Canada is to establish the national objectives.

[Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough).]

Dr. Forsey: That is a further ambiguity. The more one goes into this the deeper one sinks into the linguistic bog.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, earlier a question was raised by both Senator Stewart and Dr. Forsey as to what might be the courts' interpretation of the word "society". The Encyclopedia of Words and Phrases, Legal Maxims, Canada, 1825-1978, Third Edition by Sanagan, does not have an interpretation for the word "society." In fact, there is nothing in this book between the word "soap" and "sodomy."

Senator Doody: It would cost a fortune to get that kind of information outside.

[Translation]

The Chairman: The next person on my list on the government side is Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: Mr. Chairman, I did not hear the initial questions asked by Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough). If I happen to raise points that have already been covered, please let me know and I will drop them accordingly.

Senator Forsey, it was said that you had a problem with the term "distinct society". Wouldn't you agree that further defining "distinct society", as opposed to maintaining this general term, would create further problems?

Dr. Forsey: Further defining this term?

Senator Flynn: You suggested that the term "distinct society" should be clarified, did you not?

Dr. Forsey: Yes, I did.

Senator Flynn: But don't you think that by doing so, you might be creating more problems than by refraining from doing so?

Dr. Forsey: Possibly, but I think that would depend on the definition chosen. In fact, there are always problems, but—

Senator Flynn: Always problems?

Dr. Forsey: Yes, always. But I would like to see something more specific on the situation of the Anglophone minority in Quebec, in that "distinct society". I feel it is not quite clear.

Senator Flynn: In any case, some people who object to this term say there is not enough emphasis on the rights of the Anglophone minority, while according to others, the rights of the Francophone majority are not satisfactorily defined.

How would you resolve this dilemma?

Dr. Forsey: Well, I leave that up to the legal experts.

Senator Flynn: Indeed. So you agree that in fact—

Dr. Forsey: Well, I leave it up to the legal experts because I do not have more than a layman's knowledge in this respect.

Senator Roblin: You are very philosophical!

Senator Flynn: We might be better off with the approach taken in the case of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, that is, letting matters evolve, depending on a possible definition by the Supreme Court. I think we will be in for a few surprises, as was the case with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Senator Forsey, I suppose, for instance, you did not anticipate that in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, freedom of association would mean that unions would be able to use the money they collect for union purposes only and not for political purposes. I don't think you anticipated that.

Dr. Forsey: I didn't, but—

Senator Flynn: Would you have preferred further clarification and do you think this could have been anticipated?

Dr. Forsey: Before the Charter of Rights and Freedoms was adopted, I know former Senator Goldenberg asked the Prime Minister at the time for a more precise definition. Mr. Trudeau rejected the suggestion out of hand, saying that it would be up to the courts to decide.

Senator Flynn: I see.

Dr. Forsey: And Senator Goldenberg was profoundly shocked by the decision.

Senator Flynn: Excuse me, whom are you talking about?

Dr. Forsey: Senator Goldenberg. I was also deeply shocked.

Senator Flynn: I would like to get back to my question. Don't you think that by trying, at the time, to clarify further the meaning of freedom of association, and so forth, this would have created even more problems than the particular issue we have been confronted with recently?

Dr. Forsey: Possibly, but it would depend on the terms of the definition.

Last night in a speech, I said, and I will quote myself in English:
[English]

I think it is the duty of the legislator to indicate as precisely as possible to the courts what he has in mind.

• (1430)

Senator Flynn: I agree with that, too.

Dr. Forsey: And not simply to say: "Open the gates as wide as the sky and let the judges come riding by."

Senator Flynn: On that basis, I think the Charter of Rights would be twice or three times the size that it now is, don't you think? In using general terms in the Charter of Rights, we opened the door and we let in the flood much more than we thought we were doing.

Dr. Forsey: Yes, I think it was too inclusive, and I do not think it was well drafted.

Senator Flynn: It is very difficult to draft perfectly, Senator Forsey.

Dr. Forsey: Yes, I know. I have no claim to any special knowledge in that area. However, I remember one time I was discussing this matter with the late Elmer Driedger who did know something about drafting. I said to him: "Lawyers whose judgment, experience and knowledge I trust tell me that it was not well drafted," and he replied: "It's abominably drafted."

Senator Flynn: Yes, but, in the same fashion, do you know of any legal text that has not created a problem of interpretation?

Dr. Forsey: Of course not, but it seems to me you would want to reduce the problems as far as you can.

Senator Flynn: Let me come back again: Do you not think when you try to reduce the problem by attempting to be more precise that you create more problems?

Dr. Forsey: That is possible—

Senator Flynn: Okay, I agree with that.

Dr. Forsey: But also, it is not necessarily so either.

Senator Flynn: It is not necessarily so, but I suggest that in the present case it would be.

In any event, let us get down to brass tacks: When we come to deciding on this accord, do you suggest that we risk the fate of the accord by trying to be more specific on the "distinct society" or any other part of the accord?

Dr. Forsey: I think that is a matter for the judgment of the Senate.

Senator Flynn: But I am asking you, as an expert. You have been a member of this chamber; you should know what the consequences are of the accord or of amendments to that accord. I am asking you: Do you think that you would risk the fate of the accord?

Dr. Forsey: Yes.

Senator Flynn: On perfecting the—

Dr. Forsey: Yes.

Senator Flynn: —and at the risk of excluding Quebec, and putting Quebec back where it was before the accord?

Dr. Forsey: I suppose there is a risk in any course that you would take.

Senator Flynn: But I am asking you if you are prepared to take that risk?

Dr. Forsey: Yes. The Constitution belongs to all of us.

Senator Flynn: Yes, I agree with that.

Dr. Forsey: This accord deals not only with the powers and rights of Quebec specifically but of all the provinces.

Senator Flynn: Yes, but it belongs to all the provinces, and all of the provinces have been involved in the making of the accord and have signed it.

Senator Frith: All of the provincial governments.

Senator Stanbury: All of the premiers have signed.

Senator Flynn: At this time I am speaking of the provincial governments as well as the Government of Canada, of course.

Senator Frith: And one legislature. The Constitution requires "legislatures."

Senator Flynn: I am coming back to that question. Are you prepared to risk the accord for clarification of one term or the other, even if it is not of the essence but really is only a question of perfection?

Dr. Forsey: It may or may not be of the essence. I think in this case a "distinct society" is very much of the essence, in the first place.

In the second place, if you take the view that the accord is there and that to touch it in any way is to invite the most disastrous consequences, then you are practically saying—

Senator Flynn: The disastrous consequences at this time—

Senator Frith: Let him finish: "You are practically saying . . ." what?

Dr. Forsey: You are practically saying that the thing is "chose jugée;" that Quebec has spoken—Roma locuta est—and there is nothing further to be said.

Senator Flynn: That is what you say. "Chose jugée" would mean that the Supreme Court would have passed judgment on your view that "distinct society" is not clear enough. That would be "chose jugée," but, with great respect, I think you are pushing it a little bit, Senator Forsey. "Chose jugée" is about the practical consequences of the failure of the accord only because you have some doubts about the effect of "distinct society."

Dr. Forsey: Yes, and I think that the doubts need to be cleared up.

Senator Flynn: It cannot be cleared up if you start the negotiations again and someone gets excited about the term—as you are—and then the whole round of negotiations and agreement starts again and, in that case, is doomed to failure.

Dr. Forsey: Not necessarily.

Senator Flynn: If you want to push Quebec back to where it was before the accord only because you are not satisfied with one or two words or with an imprecision of some kind, then we are not on the same basis at all, I can assure you.

Dr. Forsey: I do not think it is a question of a word or two; I think it is a question of something—

Senator Flynn: Two words—

Senator Frith: Let him finish, for goodness sake. Can't we hear his answer? We have been listening attentively—

An Hon Senator: It is a sermon, not a question.

Senator Frith: Look, your questions are quite in order, but we have listened to them and we can't seem to get the answer.

Senator Flynn: You will get the answer; don't worry. Senator Forsey is used to me, and he is even used to you.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear the answer. Can we get it from the witness?

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I assume that in Committee of the Whole we operate under the same rules as we do in the Senate. Therefore, it is up to honourable senators to control themselves; it is not up to the Chairman. In other words, as in the Senate, we do not expect the Speaker to interfere. I have not interfered. If you want me to do that, I shall, but I assume that we operate under the same rules as we do in the Senate. However, I am asking you.

Senator Flynn: Mr. Chairman, I am listening.

The Chairman: Très bien. Dr. Forsey?

Dr. Forsey: It seems to me that the logical consequence of the view that Senator Flynn is putting forward—and I say this with great respect, because I think there is no one in this chamber for whom I have a more profound respect than I have for Senator Flynn and for his vast legal knowledge and his general good judgment. However, it seems to me that the consequence of the view that he is putting forward pretty well emasculates all of the legislatures that have yet to pronounce on this matter and both houses of the Parliament of Canada. They will be told: "You must not touch this. It is the two Tables of the Law brought down from Mount Sinai by 11 Moseses and you cannot touch it, because, if you do, the whole fabric of civilization will collapse."

Senator Flynn: I think I should make it clear again that I am speaking of problems of interpretation of certain words; I am not speaking of a substantial, very important defect. What you are saying is that "distinct society" could be clearer. You do not even say in what way it could be clearer. Go ahead and tell me in what way it could be clearer and we will see whether you can produce an obvious solution that would be accepted by everyone.

Dr. Forsey: I am not a draftsman, Senator Flynn, and I would not attempt to do that. Again, I do not think that it is a matter of just one word to clear it up. You might go through this accord and pick out various difficulties and say: "This is just one word; this is just one word; this is just one word; these are just two words." However, very serious consequences may arise from one word or two words. I am not appearing here as some sort of encyclopedia or expert draftsman and saying: "You ought to change this to read thus and so." I am not competent to do that. I raise questions which other people—yourself included—are far better able to answer than I am. However, I think I am entitled to raise the questions; that is why I am here.

Senator Flynn: You are entitled to raise the questions; I agree with you, but what I am saying is: Is your question of such importance that you have a clear solution, or that you are prepared to say: "The hell with the accord," if it cannot be made clearer?

Dr. Forsey: Whether or not I have a clear solution does not decide the question.

Senator Flynn: No. Then answer the other part.

Dr. Forsey: Which is that?

● (1440)

Senator Flynn: If you have no solution, "to hell with the accord."

Dr. Forsey: No, that I have no precise wording to suggest does not torpedo my argument nor affect—

[Senator Flynn.]

Senator Flynn: Does that not destroy your argument to even risk the fate of the accord?

Dr. Forsey: No, I do not think it does.

Senator Flynn: I mean, if you change it and if it does.

Dr. Forsey: This accord has to go before the Parliament of Canada. Of the ten provincial legislatures one has pronounced. The others have still to pronounce.

Senator Flynn: I am speaking from a practical viewpoint. You sat in this place for several years. We are speaking of 11 legislatures; let us say ten now that Quebec has accepted it. We change a word; we start a debate on changing the definition of "distinct society". It goes through a round of ten legislatures. It may be 11, in fact, because there is the Senate and the House of Commons.

Senator Stewart (Antigonish-Guysborough): It must be very fragile if it will not bear some examination or amendment.

Senator Flynn: I have no problem with that examination. I am asking a practical question. I do not mind listening to Senator Stewart ad infinitum, as we always have to do, but that is something else.

Senator Frith: It is like a museum. Look, don't touch!

Senator Flynn: I like the intervention of Senator Frith. I was here when we debated the 1982 resolution after it was signed by nine out of the ten premiers. You said that it was impossible to change anything. This argument was made over and over again, even if it excluded Quebec.

Senator Frith: You show me where I said that.

Senator Flynn: I remember that very well. We said, "Try to meet the main objections of Quebec," and you said, "It's impossible. We cannot touch it." You remember that very well.

Senator Frith: I never said that.

Senator Flynn: You should not have the gall of taking that stand.

Senator Frith: I would have the gall anyway, but I never did say that. Now, stop it.

Senator Flynn: If you did not say that, someone else next to you said it.

I think I have made my point on "distinct society." We could not foresee all the consequences, as you have said, of the Charter of Rights when we passed it. If there is something very important that flows from the generality of this term, we can change it. However, do you agree that it is important to have this process of bringing Quebec back into the Constitution? Do you think it is a major objective?

Dr. Forsey: Yes, certainly. However, it does not follow that it should be pursued at any price.

Senator Flynn: Yes. Can you point out to me the real price? Tomorrow is another day; today is today.

Thank you, senator.

Dr. Forsey: I have tried to point out what seemed to be the possible consequences of this section, notably taken with sections—

Senator Flynn: Anyway, you are in good company. You are in company with the centralists and you are in company with the separatists in this area.

Dr. Forsey: Guilt by association.

Senator Frith: What an unfair association to make.

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Flynn: There is no shame in that. If there is any shame, Senator Lang, come on, step up and speak. Is it true that the separatists opposed it?

Senator Lang: I might speak today, if you will shut up.

Senator Flynn: I am shutting up right away. Speak up, Senator Lang.

Senator Frith: Hear, hear!

Dr. Forsey: I was not able to finish my last answer. I am afraid I cannot now remember what it was I was going to say, because in the middle of my sentence I was cut off.

Senator Flynn: By the other hand.

Dr. Forsey: If the answer appears imperfect, I am afraid it is not entirely my fault.

[Translation]

The Chairman: Senator Flynn, have you finished?

Senator Flynn: For the time being, Mr. Chairman.

[English]

The Chairman: The next name on my list is Honourable Senator Lang.

Senator Lang: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Following from the remarks of Senator Flynn, I might remind him of the old adage:

I am the Parliamentary Draftsman. I draft the country's laws, and of half the litigation I am undoubtedly the cause.

Senator Flynn: Of course.

Senator Lang: I must say to Senator Forsey that I am not glad to see your back. This is a problem that is brought about by the way this chamber has arranged your position.

Some of my questions will initially be what might be termed of a legalistic nature. I know Senator Forsey will immediately profess that he is not a lawyer.

Senator Doody: Excuse me, senator, I wonder if Senator Forsey will be more comfortable in one of these other chairs.

Dr. Forsey: I will be better able to see the questioner. Thank you.

Senator Lang: I was saying that I know Senator Forsey is going to protest that he is not a lawyer. However, in my experience he has the best legal mind that I have ever come across, uninhibited by being circumscribed by legal formal education.

Looking at clause 2(1)(a) I notice that French-speaking Canadians are centred in Quebec whereas English-speaking Canadians are concentrated outside Quebec. Would normal draftsmanship not assume that the word "centred" would apply to both French-speaking and English-speaking? Can you understand why one is centred and the other con-centred, because they are obviously the same root? What significance could that have? I do not believe that this is a sloppily drafted document. I think it is a very craftily drafted document.

Dr. Forsey: I am puzzled by that discrepancy, as by some other discrepancies in the document. I should, however, point out that unless I am mistaken—and I have the two texts before me—in French the same word is used, concentrés.

[Translation]

—the existence of French-speaking Canadians, centred in Quebec but also present elsewhere in Canada, and English-speaking Canadians, concentrated outside Quebec—

[English]

The two texts are supposed to be equally authoritative, and I do not know how much importance one should attach to the difference between the words "centred" and "concentrated" in the English text. It is curious. I do not know why it is there. They used the same word in French and I do not know why they did not use the same word in English.

Senator Lang: That same query arises further on in this section. I do not know if the problem is with the translation. The word "society" is used in the English text, and then in item (3) the word "identity" is used, and, yet, there is no identity referred to in item (b). In the French text the word is "caractère". What is the difference between "identity" in English and "caractère" in French?

Dr. Forsey: I am afraid I am not a linguistic expert. I do not think I am qualified to answer that.

Senator Lang: Would you not agree that these are going to be problems that the judiciary are going to have to face sooner or later in interpreting this section?

Dr. Forsey: They may well.

Senator Lang: I note that under clause 2(2) the initiative of the Parliament and legislatures is to preserve the fundamental characteristics of Canada. It says that the Government of Quebec and the legislature of Quebec are "to preserve," but, in addition, they are "to promote." Would you attach any significance to that distinction?

● (1450)

Dr. Forsey: Yes, I am inclined to do so, and more particularly because I am under the impression that a number of the representatives of the French-speaking Canadians outside of Quebec have attached some importance to it and have wondered why the word "promote" was not used in both cases.

[Senator Lang.]

In light of what appears in the newspaper this morning and the news from Alberta about the fate of the unfortunate Monsieur Piquette, I think one may well ask why there is this discrepancy between these two subsections. I must say that I am horrified beyond description by the treatment that the Legislature of Alberta has meted out to Monsieur Piquette, and I wonder whether, if the word "promote" were in here, there would be some possibility of redress which does not appear to be open at present.

Senator Lang: Would it not be that the distinction between the wording in those two clauses would mean that it is intended to maintain the status quo outside of Quebec but not within Quebec?

Dr. Forsey: Yes; that is very much what it looks like.

Senator Lang: On the same clause again, I note that with respect to the Parliament of Canada and the provincial legislatures generally, they are to preserve certain things. But then when you get down to the Legislature of Quebec, there is, in addition, the wording that the "Government of Quebec is to preserve and promote the distinct identity of Quebec."

Does that mean that the actions in preserving and promoting identity in Quebec could be done by order in council, for example, by government, whereas for the rest of the country preserving identity is confined to Parliament and legislatures?

Dr. Forsey: That, again, seems to me to be possible. If that is not the intent, why is there this discrepancy between the two sets of words, the two phrases?

Incidentally, this gives me an opportunity to mention something that I forgot to mention the other day, namely, the size of the English-speaking minority in Quebec, which I think is sometimes overlooked. It is approximately something like 800,000 people—I was looking up the figures the other day. That figure is larger than the total population of Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island or Saskatchewan, and is larger than the total French-speaking minority in Ontario and New Brunswick combined.

So we are dealing with a rather large question here, demographically speaking, and not a tuppenny-ha'penny affair. Rights are rights, even for a minority of half a dozen people, but they assume, for practical purposes, a somewhat larger significance, I think, if they relate to a large number of people.

Senator Lang: I would like to pass on that for a moment and turn to the Supreme Court of Canada sections. I noticed in section 101 B.(2) it states:

At least three judges of the Supreme Court of Canada shall be appointed from among persons—

If you then go on and read the balance of the provisions in 101 C.(1) and following, I do not know how you could have more than three judges appointed from Quebec—unless there is some hidden method in here which I am not aware of. In other words, are those words "at least" redundant? If so, why would a good draftsman put them in there, or is there some way that under the following sections or subsections there could be more than three judges from Quebec?

Dr. Forsey: In the first place, it has been called to my attention that that phrase "at least three judges" is in the existing Supreme Court Act. I was not aware of that, but on investigation I discovered that it was so. That is the first point.

The second point is that it has been pointed out to me that the provisions for the appointment of a chief justice from among the existing members of the court are special, and that you might conceivably have one of the three Quebec judges appointed chief justice. He then might be replaced as one of the "at least three" so that in that way there would be the chief justice and three other justices from Quebec. That is about the only light that I can throw on this.

I might perhaps add this. If, in fact, you had four judges from Quebec, for example—and there is obviously room for that under this provision—it would leave five for the other provinces. I suspect that Ontario would be inclined to insist on three and the western provinces and the Atlantic provinces would have to make do as best they could with two, which might give rise to heartburnings in the west and even in the Atlantic provinces. However, that could happen now, because you already have the "at least" provision in there.

Senator Lang: The next point I would like to raise is: What is the effect of section 16? If certain groups such as Indians, Métis and others are excluded from the effects of the "distinct society" provision—

Dr. Forsey: And the duality provision.

Senator Lang: —what happens to the others, for example, the Anglo-Saxon-speaking minority in Quebec, under the doctrine of inclusio unius est exclusio alterius?

Dr. Forsey: Well, it seems to me that there is a possibility there—I would not put it more strongly, because I am not qualified to do so—that practically everything else is left open to the application of these two new principles of interpretation. In other words, that the whole of the powers of the Parliament of Canada, except for the provision on Indians and lands reserved for the Indians, the declaratory power under section 92 10.(c), for example, and so forth, and all of the provisions of the Charter, except those relating to the aboriginal peoples and multiculturalism, are open to the application of these two new principles of interpretation. What that could do to the powers of the Parliament of Canada and to the Charter of Rights is something that allows the imagination to work, shall I say, with perhaps some rather lurid consequences.

We do not know what the courts would do with this, but there is a possibility there that in a given case they might say, "Look, the two new principles of this interpretation, duality and the "distinct society," apply to this particular provision of the Charter, this particular power of the Parliament of Canada." This could make a considerable difference to the application of these various provisions of the existing Constitution.

I was reading a letter the other day from a lawyer in Toronto with whom I am not otherwise acquainted. He said that it meant that everything in the Charter, except multiculturalism and the aborigines, was up for grabs. That is perhaps putting it in the extreme form, but this was his opinion. He is a lawyer of some years of practice, and I think not altogether irresponsible, shall I say. I do not know him personally, but from the little that I have heard about him I would think that he is of some standing. That statement bothered me.

● (1500)

Senator Lang: On another matter, you will note with regard to those sections respecting appointments to the Senate and to the Supreme Court of Canada that the provinces "may"—which is the permissive "may"—nominate names whereas, with respect to the federal response, it is the mandatory "shall." I can conceive that this could create tremendous problems in the event of a non-nomination either with respect to the Senate or with respect to the Supreme Court of Canada. This could suspend the appointment procedure, and it may even do so indefinitely. Have you any thoughts on that?

Dr. Forsey: Well, the theoretical possibility is there. I am not very much frightened by it, as a matter of fact, because I find it difficult to believe that any provincial government, confronted with the possibility of recommending somebody for appointment either to the Senate or the Supreme Court of Canada, would say, "We are not going to propose anybody at all."

I suppose that you could get some freak government which would take this line. You might get an NDP government saying, "We are so against the Senate that we will have nothing to do with it, and we will not even soil our fingers by suggesting somebody for nomination." But I have a feeling that there would be a lot of NDPers in the province concerned who would say, "Well, why not? The British Labour Party is in favour of the abolition of the House of Lords, but British Labour governments appoint people to the House of Lords. If it is good enough for the holy British Labour Party, it ought to be good enough for you."

I suppose it is possible that you might get a Péquiste government who might say, "We will snarl things up properly by not nominating anybody." Again, I doubt that. I would think they would say, "At least we can put somebody in the Senate who will help us snarl things up for those blankety, blank Anglos." They would say, "We will suggest someone for appointment in the Supreme Court who would make things very difficult for the rest of the members of the court and cause a great deal of trouble which will help us get our way and break up Confederation."

I would think that the chances of a provincial government not nominating anybody are pretty slim. The difficulty, it seems to me, is more likely to arise from nominating somebody and the government here saying, "Oh, this won't do at all. This is a perfectly fantastic nomination. All six of the people you have proposed just won't do at all. Some of them are senile; some of them are corrupt; and some of them are people who know no law whatsoever and heaven alone knows how they passed their bar examinations. No, we cannot take these people." Where are you in that instance? I think the Victoria Charter, for example, had an elaborate provision for an arbitrator who would decide in cases of conflict over the nominations to the judships. Here, it seems to me, you have no provision for looking after an impasse, and that is what worries me rather than the problem of some government saying, "Oh, no, we cannot touch this."

Senator Lang: My reading of this resolution is that there are six areas that were previously dealt with under the two-thirds rule which are now being subject to unanimous consent or are to be under this resolution. In terms of that, together with the appointment procedures to the Senate and to the Supreme Court, how do you generally view the shift of constitutional jurisdiction that could flow from this document?

Dr. Forsey: Well, in general, I would say that the existing Constitution is already pretty rigid, especially in relation to changes in the Senate. This will make it rather more rigid. I am not really enthusiastic about making the Constitution more rigid. You have to have a certain degree of rigidity, but I think we have probably gone a long distance in that direction and I am dubious about going further.

I cannot see, for example, why on earth the provision for the creation of new provinces really has to be moved into the unanimous consent category. I find it difficult to believe that that is something very close to the heart of Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Rémillard and their colleagues. I wonder who in the world put it in there. What is the point of it? If it were deleted, would the whole thing collapse? Would Quebec draw back and say, "This is one of our sacred rights and we simply must have it"? I do not know. I feel dubious about this, and I do not imagine it will make an awful lot of practical difference.

As far as amendments concerning the Senate are concerned, I do not think it will make any difference at all. I think it will be so difficult to get any amendments now on the matters which require them in connection with the Senate that I do not think there will be a possibility of getting anything, but you have now certainly made it even more difficult.

As I said the other day, I think the triple E Senate is out. I do not think we could possibly get it through the seven-province formula. But now I think it is out, out, out, out, outest. When you have a unanimous consent approval, it recedes into infinity.

Senator Lang: I think I am trespassing on your time, Senator Forsey.

I would just like to wind up on one matter which I think follows on from Senator Flynn's remarks. Recently the Prime Minister has indicated, or originally he indicated—perhaps he has moved away from that position somewhat—that Quebec having signed this, the matter is now engraved in stone and that what might happen within the Parliament of Canada or the legislatures of the provinces other than Quebec would be merely exercises in futility. Combined with that, we have in this document the constitutional entrenchment of a yearly First Ministers' Conference. Can you foresee, over the longer run, that this could seriously affect our Westminster concept of parliamentary supremacy?

Dr. Forsey: Yes, I think it could. Legally I do not think it does it, but you may get, it seems to me, the possibility of a new constitutional convention arising by which people will be induced to believe that if the 11 premiers have said something, that settles the matter, because it then becomes a very important plant, so to speak, a tender plant, and you must not even touch one of the leaves lest the whole plant disappear with the most horrendous consequences.

I think we may be in danger of setting up, by convention, by understanding, not by law, a body which, in fact, will reduce Parliament and the legislatures, for purposes of constitutional amendment, to a very small role, indeed. I think there is a real danger there. I did not think that at first. I was inclined to say, as I said the other day, the First Ministers' Conferences are there and they are not going to go away, so you are merely giving them a certain extra cachet. Later on I thought "cachet" is not quite the proper word and "legitimacy" is perhaps better.

Then I began to see this tendency coming out in the remarks of the Prime Minister, even in the subsequent explanation he gave; coming out in articles in the press; and coming out in conversations I had with various knowledgeable people, that is, this idea that once the First Ministers have pronounced, that is it, and you are just fooling yourself if you think anything can be done about it: It is finished, for all practical purposes.

This, I cannot accept. I am in this respect, as in many others, a constitutional conservative. I do not like the idea of this new sanhedrin, this new infallible, omniscient and inerrant power being set up which will simply say to the legislatures and to Parliament, "The First Ministers have spoken, let all the earth keep silence before them." This worries me.

● (1510)

Senator Stanbury: By way of a supplementary question, Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether Dr. Forsey could tell us what sort of action or what sort of declaration might prevent that from becoming a convention? What sort of actions by those who are discussing the accord or what sort of declarations by some element of our society might prevent that from becoming a convention? What, if anything, would prevent it from becoming a convention?

Dr. Forsey: I think the refusal of Parliament and the legislatures to be bound by any such idea would prevent that from becoming a convention. Sir Ira Jennings in his account of conventions, which was referred to by the Supreme Court on the patriation case, said that one of the rules is: Is this understanding, this custom, this usage, this convention accepted by the people who have to work under it? If it is, that is one thing; if it is not, that is another. I think that if there is a danger of a convention like this growing up, the incisive way to stop it is for Parliament and the legislatures to say, "No, we are not going to regard this accord reached by 11 ministers as sacrosanct and untouchable."

The Chairman: Honourable senators, this morning we had tentatively agreed that we would be about an hour. Is it the wish of senators to continue? I know that there are several other questioners; I am in the hands of the committee.

Senator Frith: If we do not have any legislation, perhaps we should continue.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, Bill C-56 has arrived, as has Bill C-69. Bill C-63 is in third reading at the present time in the other place.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I believe that I am on your list of those who wish to ask questions.

The Chairman: You are.

Senator Frith: I only wanted to deal today with one question. It's about section 16. It has really been discussed by Senator Lang and Dr. Forsey. Perhaps I could just put on the record the meaning of the Latin phrase that has been used by Senator Lang and Dr. Forsey. Before we adjourn, I would like to put on the record the meaning of that phrase.

The Chairman: Is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator MacEachen: That will not be necessary for me, but perhaps for the others—

The Chairman: Should I ask all those who need the translation to raise their hands?

Senator Frith: I want to try to put the phrase in context. All Latin scholars, and I suppose all Roman Catholics of a certain age would understand it—I remember one friend of mine defining Anglicans as Roman Catholics who had failed Latin.

At any rate, as I understand it, section 16 says that nothing in section 2—which has to do with duality and the distinct society—affects sections 25 or 27 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, which two sections deal with aboriginal rights and multicultural heritage; that nothing in section 16 affects section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, which has to do with Indian and aboriginal rights; and that nothing in section 16 affects class 24 of Section 91, which has to do with Indians and lands reserved for the Indians. In the case of sections 25 and 27 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, those are only two of its sections—there are others. Therefore, section 16 of this Constitution amendment mentions two sections and does not mention the others. The same would apply to section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982 and class 24 of section 91 of the Constitution Act, 1987.

Dr. Forsey has said that there is the possibility that section 16 would be interpreted in such a way that, since it referred to those particular sections as not being affected, all of the other sections not referred to are affected.

Senator Hicks: Or could be.

Senator Frith: All right, “are” or “could be” affected. That is why I wanted simply to put on the record the interpretative maxim or principle that leads to that result.

The Latin phrase is inclusio unius est exclusio alterius.

Senator Marshall: What's that again?

Senator Frith: I'm coming to that. According to the same Encyclopaedia of Words and Phrases to which I referred earlier on the question of “society,” the definition is: “This inclusion of one means the exclusion of the other.”

There is a reference to a Supreme Court of Canada case in which this definition was applied: Tremblay v. Beaumont, 1946; there is mention made of a Quebec case, Bissonnette v. Bissonnette, which was dealt with in the Quebec Supreme Court, and a final reference to another Quebec case, Guay v. Provident Accident & Guarantee Co., and the latter reads as follows:

It is the rule—

not the possibility,

—that where the law ordains as to certain cases which it enumerates, the law is presumed to have excluded the other cases from its disposition:

Then the Latin phrase is quoted.

The same rule, incidentally, applies, for whatever interest this might be, in the United States.

In Black's Law Dictionary the definition is also “the inclusion of one is the exclusion of the other.” Therefore, the application, if that rule were applied by a court, would be such that section 2 overrides all sections of the Charter except sections 25 and 27; that it does not override section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982, and that it overrides all of the powers of Parliament under section 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867, except as they apply to class 24.

There are under section 91 of the Constitution Act, 1867, 25 classes of subjects over which Parliament may legislate, including: The regulation of trade and commerce, unemployment insurance, the raising of money by any mode of taxation, the borrowing of money on the public credit, postal service, the census and statistics, militia, military and naval service and defence, the fixing of and providing for the salaries and allowances of civil and other officers of the Government of Canada, navigation and shipping, seacoast and inland fisheries—and I am merely choosing a few of them—currency and coinage, banking, incorporation of banks and the issue of paper money, weights and measures, bills of exchange and promissory notes, interest, legal tender, bankruptcy and insolvency, patents of invention and discovery, copyrights, naturalization and aliens, marriage and divorce, the criminal law—

Senator Doody: It sounds better in Latin!

An Hon. Senator: Dispense!

Senator Frith: —the criminal law, the establishment, maintenance and management of penitentiaries, and so on. If that rule were applied, all of these classes, including some I did dispense with, would be overridden by section 2 of the constitutional amendment.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Senator Tremblay: Read subsection 1(4) at the same time.

Senator Frith: I thought senators wanted me to dispense, but I could go on. Senator Tremblay wants some more. It would also include the residual power and it would include peace, order and good government.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, I see two hands raised, those of Senator Neiman and Senator Sinclair. Is it the wish of senators to continue?

Senator Neiman: Honourable senators, I have only a brief question. I may be missing the point of this, Mr. Chairman, but section 16 begins by saying:

Nothing in section 2 of the Constitution Act, 1867—

I have been looking at the amendment and this section 2 is repealed. Are we referring to section 2 of the 1867 act or are we talking about that of 1982?

Senator Frith: No, section 2 of the Constitution Act is repealed and replaced by this new section 2. This section 2, by the Meech Lake accord, is made section 2 of the 1867 act.

● (1520)

Senator Sinclair: As a supplementary, I think Senator Frith said it “overrides.” I would suggest that it does not override; it makes it “subject to,” because it is an interpretative clause. For example, “peace, order and good government” would be “subject to” the distinct society, not “overrides.”

Senator Frith: “Subject to;” I will accept that.

Senator Grafstein: I believe that section 16 arises out of this question. I am not sure whether it is appropriate at this time. It deals with the Charter as it arises out of section 16. Is it appropriate to continue that now?

The Chairman: We had tentatively agreed to be roughly an hour. Your name is on my list. I presume that we are going to ask Senator Forsey to return, because I have several names on my list. Can it wait until the next time, Senator Grafstein?

Senator Grafstein: Perhaps I can make it short. Senator Flynn put a proposition to this chamber which I think each senator will have to answer for himself. That is whether or not the question of substantive and material defects arise as a result of the Meech Lake accord. I think from the information and opinions that I have been getting that there is a material defect, and I would like to have a brief response at this time from Dr. Forsey, and perhaps he can deliberate over the summer and we can have him come back and attack this again, because it is a complicated area.

It is simply this: As a result of section 16, has the paramountcy of the Charter of Rights been materially diluted or substantially affected in Quebec or outside of Quebec, and specifically with those sections in the Charter dealing with sections 2, 7, 15 and 23—and specifically, in connection with section 2, the question of freedom of the press?

The Chairman: I presume, senator, you are asking Senator Forsey to reply on the next occasion?

Senator Grafstein: Perhaps he can respond briefly now, and then think about it, because it is an important question.

Dr. Forsey: I am afraid my answer is, “Yes”; but if I might borrow from the usage of the chamber, I should prefer to take notice of it and give an answer at some future time—always supposing by “future time” I have not been retired up or down.

[Translation]

Senator Denis: Mr. Chairman, am I to understand that Senator Forsey is supposed to meet us again in Committee of the Whole?

The Chairman: Yes, Senator Denis.

Senator Denis: You are supposed to come back and you agree?

Dr. Forsey: God willing, after all I am 83 now!

Senator Denis: We shall be delighted to have you. You can come back with your doctor!

Senator Flynn: Senator Forsey, Senator Denis is about your age!

[English]

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order. Has there been any discussion with the steering committee concerning travel to the two northern territories to discuss the Meech Lake accord?

The Chairman: No, Senator Lucier, there has been no discussion of travel by the steering committee.

Senator Lucier: Mr. Chairman, I would like to speak on behalf of the people of both territories, who have been directly and adversely affected by the Meech Lake accord, with no participation, no input, at any of the meetings. They feel that they have been betrayed by the one person who supposedly represented them at those meetings—namely, the Prime Minister of Canada.

I would like to make it clear that the people of the north are not upset with the premiers. They were there getting what they could for their provinces. That was their job. I also want to make it very clear at this time that the people of northern Canada would like to see Quebec become part of the Constitution. I fully agree with the objectives of the Meech Lake accord.

However, I would like to make it clear that we feel that we had a representative at those meetings who was not elected by the people of the north. The Prime Minister of Canada was supposedly speaking for the north, and we feel that he sold us down the river.

I find it very difficult to accept that, whereas the people of northern Canada have always been quietly cast as second class citizens, we have now been openly declared to be second class citizens. There are four areas of the Meech Lake accord on which the people of the north want to be heard. They are aboriginal rights, provincial status, naming of judges and senators, and holding of constitutional conferences.

By giving an absolute veto on constitutional changes to every province, the Canadian Prime Minister has, in one sentence, doomed the aboriginal people to their present status, has precluded the Yukon and the Northwest Territories from becoming provinces in the future, has made no provision for naming senators or judges from the territories, and has made no provision to enable us to attend future constitutional conferences.

Honourable senators, what kind of a rag is this? There was always the feeling that those Canadian citizens who live in the northern one-third of Canada were a little less than those in the rest of Canada, but this document now spells out that they are second class citizens. It has made it very clear that with the provincial vetoes the Yukon and the Northwest Territories will never become a province. It will be virtually impossible for that to happen.

There is a clause which says that nothing is taken away from the aboriginal people. Well, big deal! It says that nothing is taken away from them, yet we give the provinces an absolute veto which says that any province can now veto a request of the aboriginal people for self-government. So, the government has not said they cannot have self-government. All it has done is to say to the provinces: "If all ten of you agree, they will have it."—which means that it will never happen.

It says that the naming of judges and senators—the clause is very clear—will be done by the provincial premiers through a list. It does not say that the judges and senators from the Yukon and Northwest Territories will then be named by the Prime Minister. It does not say that. It says nothing. It is unbelievable. It says only that the premiers and the Prime Minister will now hold conferences every year to discuss the welfare of Canada. It does not mention the two territories. We are not invited. We cannot participate.

An Hon. Senator: You will be taken over by the provinces.

Senator Lucier: That would be the worst thing that could happen to us. Honourable senators, the people of northern Canada can be very proud of the treatment they have received over the years from the Canadian Senate. I have now been a member of the Senate for 12 years, and during that time honourable senators have taken a great interest in the north. Senate committees have travelled to northern Canada to hear the people of the north on matters concerning health, oil and gas, the environment, fisheries, and so on. A terrific job has been done by Senator Marshall in connection with fisheries. The Senate has done a good job of hearing the views of northerners. Surely, to be consistent on something as basic as the Constitution, we are not going to ignore the people of the north and not travel to the north.

Again I would like to point out that this is not a partisan issue. It seems that I am always saying that in the Senate. This is not a partisan issue. This is an issue in which the whole Senate must take an interest and in whether the northerners are to be heard on this issue. When the Deputy Prime Minister was asked in the other place if the joint committee would travel, his answer was very clear. He said:

It is not the intention of the Government to allow the committee to travel, for a number of reasons. We think the logistics and the difficulties in organizing such travel would cause problems which would be almost insurmountable.

It is only one-third of Canada. What the hell, they don't count! He continued:

However, certainly from the standpoint of accommodating people who may want to be heard, I think there can be arrangements made which would hopefully facilitate and satisfy groups such as the Hon. Member indicated.

Now, isn't that beautiful? The Deputy Prime Minister of Canada is saying, "This is too important for the people of northern Canada. It would be too much trouble to go up there and talk to them, but if you want to bring a couple of them down here to speak to the committee, we will do that."

● (1530)

Honourable senators, nothing in the Senate has riled me as much as this accord has. I want you to know that it is not just me. The people of northern Canada are damn mad about this thing. They are very upset over it, as they should be. For this chamber to allow this document to go through would in itself be a disgrace, but to do it without hearing from the people in the north would be unforgivable. I ask the support of all senators in seeing to it that a committee of this chamber travels to the north and hears not only the views of people in Yellowknife and Whitehorse but the views of people in all the areas of northern Canada affected by this legislation. At least, they ought to be given an opportunity to tell the government how bad a job it is doing.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

The Chairman: Thank you, Senator Lucier. The members of the steering committee, most of whom are here, will have heard your comments.

Honourable senators on the list who wish to ask questions are Senators van Roggen, Fairbairn, Grafstein, MacEachen, Frith and Le Moynes. There may be others who have not raised their hand yet.

Dr. Forsey, thank you very much again. We look forward to the pleasure of seeing you the next time the committee meets.

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, you may take my name off the list. If I wish to speak again, I shall go to the bottom of the list. I have had my opportunity for this round.

I move that the committee adjourn, report progress and ask for leave to sit again.

The Chairman: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole, to which the Meech Lake accord and texts subsequently agreed to were referred, reports progress and asks for leave to sit again.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this committee have leave to sit again?

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I move that the Committee of the Whole be given authority to sit again at the next sitting of the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-56, to amend certain Acts relating to financial institutions.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. William M. Kelly: Honourable senators, I am pleased today to introduce Bill C-56. I might say I have been here, waiting patiently, since 11 o'clock this morning to introduce this bill. My whip said that I had to be here.

Senator Frith: Put me in there, coach.

Senator Doody: One for the gypper.

Senator Phillips: He should have been here yesterday, too.

Senator Kelly: Bill C-56 will amend certain acts relating to financial institutions. As honourable senators are aware, this bill is part of a package of current and forthcoming legislative initiatives. The package of legislation brings together a long list of initiatives and proposals at both the federal and provincial levels relating to the financial sector. These initiatives include: the McDougall Green Paper, properly known as "The Regulation of Canadian Financial Institutions: Proposals for Discussion", tabled in April 1985; the Report of the Ontario Task Force on Financial Institutions, tabled in the Ontario Legislature on November 18, 1985; the report by the Economic Council of Canada; the Sixteenth Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, tabled on May 1, 1986; the Report of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, tabled in November 1985; the Inquiry into the Failures of the Northland Bank and Canadian Commercial Bank headed by Justice Estey; the announcement by the Ontario Government in December of last year to open up the ownership restrictions on Ontario investment dealers; the Ottawa, Ontario Agreement of April 1987 on the Regulation of Investment Dealers operating in Ontario, and I should not forget to add to this list the announcement in 1983 that the Government of Quebec intended to remove foreign ownership restrictions on investment dealers in that province. Some of my colleagues may wonder why I have paid so much attention to Ontario's initiative in this regard and suspect that I am motivated by chauvinism.

Senator Doody: Never!

Senator Kelly: As you all know, the Toronto Stock Exchange persists as Canada's largest exchange. The TSE requires investment dealers registered with it to abide by the ownership and other regulatory requirements imposed by the Ontario Securities Commission. In this way Ontario's requirements have become something of a de facto national standard.

Bill C-56 consolidates and amends Bills C-8 and C-9, which were tabled in the other place in October 1986. In turn, Bills C-8 and C-9 originate from Bills C-123 and C-103 that died on the Order Paper in the other place at the end of the previous session of Parliament. Bill C-56 proposes to amend a total of nine federal statutes, including the Bank Act, the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act, the Foreign Insurance Companies Act, the Loan Companies Act and the Trust Companies Act.

My major interest is the effect Bill C-56 will have on the traditional four-pillars policy of the Canadian financial sector, and I shall address the significance of this impact later. As honourable senators are probably aware, the impact of Bill C-56 in the cross-ownership area has been narrowed considerably due to an agreement between the government and the House of Commons Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs reached last week. As a consequence of that agreement, the provisions of Bill C-56 allowing financial institutions to acquire securities dealers remain, but analogous provisions relating to the ownership of insurance, trust and loan companies have been deleted and will be handled in a separate bill tabled in the other place. This bill originally included a requirement that the Minister of Finance approve direct or indirect purchases or significant interests in federal financial institutions. The minister had proposed that the enabling clauses in Bill C-56 be replaced by the clauses that had originally been drafted for Bills C-8 and C-9, given that it was discovered that the C-56 rules would have required ministerial approval for transfers in ownership of companies that were unrelated to financial institutions.

● (1540)

The concern expressed about the relationship between the approval mechanism and the new ownership policy also led the minister to announce that the share transfer approval rules would not be proclaimed until the ownership policy legislation had been released and debated in Parliament. While I understand the rationale behind the agreement reached, I must say—and perhaps this is my inexperience showing—that I find the last-minute changes rather frustrating and irritating, especially since many of these provisions have been before Parliament for some time.

Honourable senators, I do not intend to get into the details of Bill C-56. In essence, this proposes five changes or adjustments. First, federally-regulated financial institutions would be able, subject to the approval of the Minister of Finance, to acquire or set up securities firms. No distinction is made in the bill between domestic and foreign-owned national institutions. I understand, however, that applications from foreign-owned financial institutions will be the focus of particular scrutiny, and that one of the criteria to be applied will be reciprocity. In other words, the extent to which Canadian and other foreign institutions enjoy the same privileges in the applicant's country of residence.

Further, the minister has stated that in reviewing applications the government intends to apply the regime set out in his December policy paper. This includes a one-year delay before non-residential financial institutions can take full advantage of the powers provided by this bill. The new regime will mean that as of June 30, 1987, foreign investors will be able to acquire up to 50 per cent of the ownership of a securities dealer and as of June 30, 1988, foreign investors may acquire up to 100 per cent. The establishment of a securities subsidiary by a foreign institution prior to June 30, 1988, would result in the subsidiary being limited for one year to the activities which its Canadian parent is already permitted to do in-house.

Furthermore, any non-resident owning a Schedule "B" bank in Canada and wishing to acquire or establish a securities dealer would be required to do so through the Schedule "B" bank.

Second, a mutual life insurance company will be deemed to be a resident Canadian company if its head office and chief place of business are located in Canada and if at least 75 per cent of its directors are Canadian citizens. This amendment to the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act removes the uncertainty faced by mutual life insurance companies having a substantial portion of their policyholders outside of Canada. Because mutual life insurance companies are owned by their policyholders, under the previous approach the residency of such companies was defined by the foreign residency of their policyholders. I think this change—which has long been requested by the industry—makes good sense.

Third, the Superintendent of Financial Institutions would have the power to order any financial institution to cease and desist, and I quote:

... any act or course of conduct he deems to constitute as unsafe or unsound business practice.

These powers proposed for the Superintendent of Financial Institutions have been the subject of some concern by industry spokesmen. I would like to point out, however, that some half dozen insurance companies have failed over the past five years. Imprudent management practices have often been a factor. The Superintendent of Insurance has testified on more than one occasion that his office lacked the regulatory authority in these areas to intervene in a timely and effective way. Bill C-56 represents a great step toward rectifying these problems.

Fourth, the Superintendent would be given the power to obtain an independent appraisal of real estate assets held by any trust, loan or insurance company in order to determine compliance with solvency ratios. Honourable senators, inaccurate valuations of real estate assets, particularly valuations used to justify the 75 per cent loan-to-value ratios in mortgage lending, have been the cause of difficulties for financial institutions in the past and a persistent source of concern to regulatory authorities.

Fifth, the approval of the Superintendent would be required to cede re-insurance business to companies with which the insurer is associated, and cabinet is given the authority to issue regulations limiting the extent to which an insurance company may re-insure.

The measures proposed in this bill have been in the public domain for several months and, in the main, are generally supported by the industry. In terms of impact, the most significant provisions of this bill are those that authorize federally-chartered and regulated financial institutions to own investment dealers.

Bill C-56, thereby, will begin the dismantling of the separation of the "four pillars" of the financial sector which, to date, has characterized Canadian policy. This old system, to which I admit I have had considerable loyalty, imposed restrictions on cross-ownership within the financial sector to insure that companies within each "pillar" and their policies and practices were independent, professionally-owned and managed and largely Canadian-owned.

This major change in approach responds to an international trend towards the integration of the "pillars." It also responds to the exigencies of international competition.

If the Canadian financial sector is to be able to compete in an increasingly competitive and deregulated international environment, Canadian financial institutions must be able to increase their capital bases and enhance their international connections.

Allow me to provide a few illustrations: Canada's largest investment dealer, Dominion Securities Inc., has net assets under administration of roughly $3.1 billion. The top seven investment dealers in Canada together account for net assets under administration of something of the order of $12.5 billion. Any of the larger U.S. brokers individually account for two, three or four times that figure. Merrill Lynch alone, for example, has $53 billion U.S. in assets under administration.

The same is true of the Canadian banking sector. The Royal Bank—Canada's largest chartered bank—accounts for $99.6 billion in assets. Together the Canadian "big five" chartered banks account for about $385 billion. These figures pale in comparison to some of the banks with which they compete internationally. The Fuji Bank of Japan has $220 billion U.S. in assets. The top five Japanese banks together account for more than $900 billion U.S. in assets. Citibank, the largest U.S. bank, has $196 billion U.S. in assets. In terms of deposits, as of December 31, 1985, American Banker ranked the Royal Bank twenty-sixth in the world, the Bank of Montreal thirty-seventh, the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce forty-first, the Bank of Nova Scotia fifty-second and the TD Bank sixty-fifth.

Permitting financial institutions to own securities firms is an important and perhaps vital step towards giving the Canadian securities industry access to new sources of capital.

Bill C-56 also responds to current trends in the securities industry. Increased use of computers linked to international networks has increased the internationalization of the securities industry, with more and more businesses flowing to major centres such as Tokyo, London and New York. Canadian investment dealers must be strengthened or they risk being left in a backwater.

Further, "securitization"—the new process by which corporations raise debt and equity through securities rather than through bank-held notes—has recently become a favoured vehicle for raising money in the capital markets. Canadian dealers require enhanced capital bases if they are to play a role in this form of financing, which last year accounted for 84 per cent of all borrowing worldwide.

No government is able to embark upon such a major initiative as this having foreseen all or even most of the circumstances, challenges and pitfalls that might confront it. Having made the decision to permit financial institutions to own investment dealers, I think the government has acted wisely in drafting this bill so as to require the Minister of Finance to approve the acquisition or establishment of securities dealers on a case-by-case basis.

As currently cast, the bill does not contain any criteria on which approvals will be based, and thus gives very wide discretion to the minister.

As a general principle, honourable senators, I am opposed to providing ministers or officials with wide administrative discretion. Too often this can be used by governments as a "blank cheque", and the discretion can be used to implement policies or directions never examined or approved by Parliament. Wide discretionary powers can also lead to inconsistent application in practice.

In this case, however, I have concluded that such discretionary powers represent the only practical way. We are, to an extent, embarking on an unknown path.

● (1550)

The Minister of State has pointed out on several occasions the pace of regulatory change in other jurisdictions, particularly in the securities field. The government, therefore, needs the flexibility to respond fully and effectively to unforeseen situations and to changing requirements and circumstances.

I would hope that having gained experience through reviewing ownership requests, the government will be able to establish clear, public guidelines to govern the exercise of ministerial discretion. One day I hope to see these guidelines entrenched in legislation.

Other clauses in Bill C-56 provide very wide ministerial discretion related to ministerial approvals, however, of changes in ownership of financial institutions. As I noted earlier, these sections have been withdrawn from the bill and are being introduced separately. This, again, was through an agreement reached three days ago.

[Senator Kelly.]

There is one final issue raised by Bill C-56 that I would like to address. The integration of our financial system, especially when coupled with any integration of financial firms with non-financial interests, increases the potential for abuses and conflicts. A corporate structure performing a variety of financial functions has increased opportunity for self-dealings and conflict of interest situations.

The paper released by the Minister of State for Finance in December of last year addressed this issue through ownership requirements and through restrictions on self-dealing by commercially-linked financial institutions. The December paper also proposed measures such as "Chinese walls" within institutions, greater disclosure to consumers, and enhanced internal security through the creation of monitoring groups within each institution. I understand that these and other elements of the ownership policy will be set out in the legislation currently being drafted by the government. I look forward to reviewing that legislation, as I am sure do many of my colleagues.

Honourable senators, I believe that Bill C-56 is an important and positive initiative by the government. It enhances and clarifies the important parts of the regulatory framework, and provides for greater integration and controlled internationalization of the Canadian securities industry. As such, I commend it to your approval.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I am sure all of us would want to thank Senator Kelly for the excellent exposition he has made of this legislation.

If I may, senators, I would like to once again do what I did this morning, and that is to draw to the attention of this house, and hopefully to the attention of government, that giving people bills as complicated as this bill or Bill C-42, without providing consolidation, is not only unfair but it is wrong. I must say that when the third tranche of these bills comes forward—which I understand is three times the size of Bill C-42 or Bill C-56—at least we will be provided with a consolidation so that we do not have to thrash through numerous statutes.

As Senator Kelly has noted, Bill C-56 amends nine statutes. To try to grasp the amending factors and the effect they have on the Bank Act, the effect they have on the Insurance Act and the effect they have on the Loans Act is a little too much. I hope when the third tranche comes along that we will be given the opportunity to pre-study it, because I can assure honourable senators it is not an easy job to go through these kinds of statutes in a hurry. It is equally important to understand what is being proposed.

I certainly hope that when the next piece of legislation comes forward, we get the opportunity to handle it in a quiet and orderly manner, and that we press the government—and I am looking at the Deputy Leader of the Government—to give us a consolidation at the same time.

Senator Kelly has stated that this bill is an important piece of legislation. There is no question about that. It does move forward a very major step. All Canadians have to recognize that the effect of it is going to be, over time, to take what has been purely an independent Canadian operation, namely, security dealers, and put them under foreign control. Over time, that will happen. It is as sure as anything.

I gave you some idea of the size in the world of these companies. Let me give you one more example. Namura Securities of Japan has twice the capital of all financial institutions in Canada—banks, trust companies, loan companies and security dealers. It is the largest one in Japan, and it is open to Canadian operation. Now, in the first year, it is limited. However, in a year from now it will have a much broader mandate. I do not know that that is bad, but the securities dealers of substance, as we know them, may disappear. However, there will be others come forward that will be dealing with niches, and there will be boutiques that are operating as Canadians. As you know, one of the largest investment dealers in the United States, Solomon Brothers, does not even bother to try to sell retail. In Canada the retail part of our market is very important.

Honourable senators, I am somewhat disturbed, as I understand Senator Kelly is, that at a very late date significant changes were made to this bill. I am deeply concerned—as I hope many senators are—with the public perception that there is a lot of hanky panky going on in the financial security business. Up to now no shoes have dropped in Canada, but they certainly have dropped in the United States; they have dropped in the U.K., and financial people of substantial standing, incorporations in Germany, have been in trouble. It is quite a thing when someone becomes a convicted felon in a financial institution. There is nothing that requires confidence more than financial institutions, and there is nothing that requires confidence more than people who have discretion on investment. That is what many trust companies have. I do not think it is good enough to put up “Chinese walls”. I do not think it is good enough to rely on corporate governance to give the public the confidence they need to have in financial institutions not being involved in self-dealing or other improper activities.

Commercial links between financial institutions and non-financial institutions open up a whole series of problems. In Bills C-8 and C-9 they tried to deal with this with a 50 per cent rule, or what is called a legal control rule. The word “control” of a financial institution and the word “control” of any corporation is one that is very difficult to define. It can range to widely-held organizations, in some cases, to as low as 15 per cent, where they have members on executive committees and have significant influence in policy matters. As a result of difficulty of control, from the provision of Bills C-8 and C-9, the minister, when he first introduced Bill C-56, moved to a 10 per cent rule. People came out of the woodwork saying that the matter had not been debated, so they went back to Bills C-8 and C-9 and that did not satisfy anybody either. So, he has taken it all out.

Commercial links are out; ownership links are out with respect to a certain element of the finance community, and they have been left for the third tranche. We will have to deal with a prohibition by statute of self-dealing, or a limitation of self-dealing by statute, or a severe limitation on cross ownership. We expect to see that in the next bill. That was one of the more difficult parts of Bill C-56 that has now been removed.

Insofar as the permission to enable banks to purchase all or part of the shares of a security firm is concerned, that was inevitable. It is fine that it has gone forward. The banks in Canada apparently have taken the position that they will be building with subsidiaries. As Senator Kelly has said, foreign banks wishing to get into the securities business have to do so through a Schedule “B” bank.

• (1600)

I feel that the regulations imposed by the new Superintendent of Financial Institutions—and covered by Bill C-42—will be able to deal with this matter, but I think senators should realize one thing: We have had an exempt market in Canada. After this bill goes through, there is no longer an exempt market in Canada. We even have regulations for deals between sophisticated people dealing in government securities. The exempt market is now a regulated one. The markets that have been regulated under the Ontario Securities Act and the statutes of other provinces have been expanded so that investment dealers—whether they are free standing, owned and controlled by banks, or owned or controlled by foreign institutions—will now be covered by regulation in the exempt market. Maybe that is a good thing. At least we will have a handle on what has been going on. When you consider that over-trading by one financial dealer in New York resulted in the loss of $250 million, maybe we should be worried about control in the exempt markets.

One of the things that was brought to the attention of the committee, honourable senators, was differences between various types of financial institutions. The purpose of the government was moving towards a level playing field. When the committee drew some of these matters to the attention of officials and the minister, he took action to correct them. I think that the government's thrust is towards a level playing field.

One area where the statute does not provide for a level playing field is in the appraisal of assets. Under the legislation, the Inspector of Financial Institutions can revalue any asset of a bank, but he can only revalue real estate assets of other financial institutions. With the extended powers of institutions other than banks and the growth in that area, the differences between banks and other types of financial institutions is disappearing. The minister has said that in the third tranche he will take a look at possibly giving the Inspector General power to deal with all assets of all financial institutions. I think that that would be better.

One other thing that bothered the committee was the provision under the Bank Act where a bank could not enter into a joint venture or a partnership. The committee found it difficult to accept that; that was not addressed.

If you are giving the bank a right to buy all or part of a security dealer, why would you not allow the bank to enter into a partnership or a joint venture? Surely to do something less than a whole ownership should be allowed. That provision comes from the old ideas of controlling commercial banks, and it was not addressed. There, again, the minister pointed out that there was a provision in the Bank Act where, if you wanted to enter into a joint venture, you could get an exemption for a two-year period. That is already provided for; you can get an exemption by application to the minister. That application can be further extended at the end of two years. However, you should not force people to go back with the uncertainties of two-year tranches. I think that that should be looked at.

Senator Kelly has said that this is a major step. Certainly no one knows exactly how all things will work out. This legislation may not be perfect, but if problems arise they can be addressed. I do think, honourable senators, that this legislation is sound and should receive your approval. Even though there are substantial changes from the bill that we looked at in the committee, I think we have to accept the view of the government that they will take out all of those ownership and commercial links and put them into the next piece of legislation. It is unfortunate that time did not give the government an opportunity to meet some of these problems, but, in any event, we have to remember one thing: The minister has put everyone on notice that as and from December 18, 1986, when his white paper came forward dealing with financial institutions, anyone who departs from the rules regarding ownership or commercial linkage may have to unscramble the egg that they have put together. Hopefully there will not be those kinds of cases until we get the rules, but if there are some, anyone who does proceed must know that they are doing so at their peril.

Honourable senators, I do not want to take any more time. I feel that a difficult drafting job has been undertaken with some skill. The policy, I think, is proper, and the deferment of the commercial links and ownerships of certain types of financial institutions is regrettable, but, nevertheless, necessary so that we can address it properly when it comes before us.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is leave granted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

SEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE TABLED

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

[Senator Sinclair.]

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, on behalf of Senator Tremblay, I have the honour to table the Seventh Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology. This report is entitled "Child Benefits: Proposal for a Guaranteed Family Supplement Scheme."

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Robertson, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

CUSTOMS TARIFF DUTIES RELIEF ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-69, to amend the Customs Tariff and the Duties Relief Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that this bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, the bill as such was not considered by the Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. However, the committee did examine the subject matter of the bill. You will recall, honourable senators, that Senator Sinclair, chairman of the committee, reported yesterday and that committee members recommended in favour of approving the bill.

The bill provides for four categories of changes. It has received the support and approval of six groups of companies. Only one company objected to the bill.

[English]

This bill before us today provides for four categories of tariff changes. The first involves those changes that are being undertaken at the request of Canadian manufacturers and will assist in maintaining the competitiveness of Canadian firms.

Some of these changes may, on the surface, appear small and even inconsequential. I might, for example, point to the removal of duty on sewing machine needles and on lambskin imported from countries entitled to the British preferential tariff. However, I am certain that honourable senators will appreciate that there are many companies across the country, both large and small, that are affected by the Customs Tariff on a daily basis. Tariff changes such as those contained in this bill, although small from the perspective of the national economy, are critically important to the companies that request them, and can often have a direct impact on maintaining jobs in Canada.

Another change I might point to involves the removal of duty on polyethylene netting used by farmers to protect fruit crops from birds. This will be of benefit to the agricultural community.

The livestock industry will also benefit indirectly from the duty-free treatment being accorded to mobile veterinary clinics. These units are not manufactured in Canada, and duty-free entry will allow veterinarians to better serve their clients, particularly in rural areas.

[Translation]

The second type of tariff changes contained in this bill, honourable senators, covers those which implement the recommendations contained in Phase II of the Tariff Board's report on tariff items concerning goods made and not made in Canada. These recommendations and the measures we are adopting, arise from a commitment made by Canada at the Tokyo Round of multilateral trade negotiations.

[English]

For years one of the significant features of the customs tariff has been the determination of rate of duty based on whether or not the goods are made in Canada. Generally, as you all know, goods made in Canada attract a higher rate of duty. However, our trading partners objected to this approach because of the uncertainty created for their exporters.

The determination of whether goods were deemed to be made in Canada was an administrative decision made by Customs, and the status of goods could change with little notice. They argued for identifying the goods that were determined to be "made" and "not made" in Canada. Therefore, in return for freer access for some of our exports to major markets, Canada agreed to undertake a review of its "made" and "not made" tariff items.

The matter was referred to the Tariff Board for study and public input, and its reports and recommendations were issued in two phases. Most of the Tariff Board recommendations have been implemented by previous legislation. The tariff changes encompassed by this bill complete the outstanding statutory changes required as a result of our Tokyo Round commitment on "made" and "not made" items.

I am certain that honourable senators will remember that in response to the U.S. imposition of a 35 per cent tariff on Canadian exports of red cedar shakes and shingles, the government, through the introduction of a notice of ways and means motion in the House last June, imposed higher rates of duty on a range of goods, originating principally in the United States. The government also acted to tighten controls on the export of cedar logs and bolts. These actions were not taken lightly. Canada needed to send a strong message to the United States about its protectionist action and had to guard against a loss of Canadian jobs.

The action taken by the government achieved its purpose. The restrictions on the export of cedar logs and bolts protected the competitiveness of the Canadian industry while the tariff measures demonstrated that protectionist action on the United States' part could not be undertaken without cost to it.

I am certain, therefore, that all senators welcomed the Minister of Finance's budget announcement that, having served its purpose, the tariff component of the government's response to the U.S. action on red cedar shakes and shingles was being amended forthwith.

Since the legislation to enact the motion of last June has not been considered by Parliament, this bill amends the Customs Tariff to give effect to higher rates of duty on certain items, commencing June 6, 1986. It also restores, effective February 19, 1987, the rates of duty that were in place prior to June 6 of last year.

[Translation]

Finally, honourable senators, the bill includes a number of major technical changes to the Customs Tariff and the Duties Relief Act. Among other things, it is aimed at achieving conformity between the French and English versions of these Acts.

[English]

I might also add for the benefit of honourable senators that two of the technical changes to the Customs Tariff are being made to reflect recommendations received from the Standing Joint Committee on Regulations and other Statutory Instruments.

In conclusion, the amendments contained in this bill to the "made" and "not made" tariff items and to some of the items involved in Canada's response to the U.S. action on cedar shakes and shingles give effect to important trade policy decisions. The bill also responds to the evolving needs of Canadian business and holds benefits for Canadian firms and for individual Canadians from many walks of life. It responds as well to recommendations of a joint parliamentary committee. As such, the bill deserves the full support of all honourable senators.

• (1620)

In closing, I should add that the government action, which took effect from June 6, 1986, to February 1987, and which imposed additional duties upon books, semi-conductors and other things like Christmas trees, tea bags, and so forth, resulted in additional revenues of $36.2 million over that period. The other changes contained in this bill have a neutral effect; that is, they will not affect the deficit that was planned, announced and projected for this year.

[Translation]

In concluding, I again wish to recommend adoption of this bill on second reading. Thank you, honourable senators.

[English]

Hon. A. Irvine Barrow: Honourable senators, I wish to thank Senator Simard, the sponsor of Bill C-69, to amend the Customs Tariff and the Duties Relief Act, for the care and precise explanation he has given.

As all honourable senators know, this bill has recently been the subject of a pre-study conducted by the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The committee filed its report yesterday with the recommendation that the bill be favourably considered by the Senate. There are, however, a couple of points I wish to make.

Under clause 5 of the bill, item 21950-1 is struck from the Customs Tariff and authority to establish tariffs is transferred directly to the cabinet. Item 21950-1 is chemicals, except antibiotics, of a kind not produced in Canada when for use in the manufacture of animal or poultry feeds. I question the necessity for the change in this procedure.

In June 1986, as Senator Simard has said, the United States government imposed a 35 per cent tariff on Canadian exports of red cedar shakes and shingles. Our government responded by imposing tariffs on a variety of controversial items, including books and computer parts. The total value of the related U.S. exports was not as large as the value of the U.S. tariff, nor was it as large as the value of the Canadian shake and shingle exports. This retaliatory effort was seen to be a silly and unnecessary imposition on the public at large. As a result of what was largely public opposition, the government, in its February 1987 budget, announced that it would remove the retaliatory tariffs. Orders in council were employed to remove the tariffs on books, printed matter, computer parts and semi-conductors. Clause 6 of Bill C-69 would, first, impose the tariffs on the remaining items and then reset them to their pre-June 1986 levels, thus completing the removal of these increases.

In the May 1985 budget the government announced that as of January 1, 1987, automobile and other motor vehicle parts from developing countries would be subject to two-thirds of the most-favoured-nation rate. In addition to implementing changes concerning goods "made" and "not made" in Canada, clauses 2 and 5 of Bill C-69 would implement higher tariffs on motor vehicle parts imported from developing countries. Specifically, clause 2 of bill C-69 would strike the tariff rates previously in place while clause 5 would implement the new tariff rates.

Although the government is to be commended for this move, it still has not addressed the question of requiring offshore auto manufacturers to adhere to the North American auto pact. By not addressing the unequal treatment, in the final analysis the government may be jeopardizing the auto pact itself.

Honourable senators, with those few remarks, I recommend that Bill C-69 be given second reading. In my view, it is not necessary that any further study be done by the Banking, Trade and Commerce Committee.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

[Senator Simard.]

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, YEAR OF PROCLAMATION (NEWFOUNDLAND ACT)—MOTION ADOPTED

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 12:

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the motion of the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Marshall:

That, whereas section 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada may be made by proclamation issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada where so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and House of Commons and of the legislative assembly of each province to which the amendment applies;

Now therefore the Senate resolves that an amendment to the Constitution of Canada be authorized to be made by proclamation issued by Her Excellency the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada in accordance with the schedule hereto:

SCHEDULE

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION OF CANADA

I. (1) Section 3 of the Newfoundland Act is renumbered as subsection 3(1).

(2) Section 3 of the said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following subsection:

"(2) a reference to this Act, or a reference to the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the Schedule to this Act, shall be deemed to include a reference to any amendments thereto"

2. (1) Term 17 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the Schedule to the said Act is renumbered as Term 17(1).

(2) Term 17 of the Terms of Union of Newfoundland with Canada set out in the Schedule to the said Act is further amended by adding thereto the following:

"(2) For the purposes of paragraph one of this Term, the Pentecostal Assemblies of Newfoundland have in Newfoundland all the same rights and privileges with respect to denominational schools and denominational colleges as any other class or classes of persons had by law in Newfoundland at the date of Union, and the words "all such schools" in paragraph (a) of paragraph one of this Term and the words "all such colleges" in paragraph (b) of paragraph one of this Term include, respectively, the schools and the colleges of the Pentecostal Assemblies of Newfoundland."

3. This amendment may be cited as the Constitution Amendment, year of proclamation (Newfoundland Act)—(Honourable Senator Lewis).

Hon. P. Derek Lewis: Honourable senators, I have much pleasure in rising to support this motion, which proposes the adoption of the first amendment to the Terms of Union between Newfoundland and Canada.

Since these Terms of Union are part of the Canadian Constitution, the amendment proposed must be made under one of the amending formulae of the Constitution. Specifically, section 43 of the Constitution Act, 1982 provides that a provision of the Constitution, which applies to one or more but not to all provinces, may be amended by proclamation when so authorized by resolutions of the Senate and the House of Commons and of the legislative assemblies of the provinces to which the amendment applies.

In this case, the constitutional provision in question provides for the maintenance of denominational schools in Newfoundland, and hence the proposed amendment certainly applies only to the province of Newfoundland.

The object of this motion is to amend the provisions of the Constitution by adding a further clause to Term 17 of the Terms of Union that will enshrine in the Constitution the educational rights of the people of the Pentecostal faith in Newfoundland. Term 17 of the Terms of Union ratified the adoption of the system of denominational schools in the province. It entrenched the rights of those various religious denominations at that time—that is, 1949—specifically then authorized by the law of Newfoundland to operate denominational schools. At that time, the educational rights of the Pentecostal Assemblies were not recognized under Newfoundland law, and thus their rights were outside the provisions of Term 17.

In 1954 recognition was given by the province to the Pentecostal Assemblies as being organized for educational purposes, and they have operated in that manner as a separate denominational school system, but without the status, integrity or protection given to other denominations under Term 17 of the Terms of Union. The Pentecostal Assemblies have for some time been anxious to be in a position similar to other recognized school-operating denominations.

Despite this situation, the Pentecostal Assemblies have continued to operate and expand their educational system and today operate some of the most modern, effective and progressive educational facilities in the province. They are to be commended for the very valuable service they have provided to society, and to the provincial denominational education system in particular. This system is very important to the fabric of the distinct society that is the province of Newfoundland.

Surely it is the time to rectify the situation as desired by the Pentecostal Assemblies and to enshrine their rights in the Constitution. As Senator Doody said in introducing this motion, the Government of Newfoundland has requested this amendment and a resolution to this effect was, on April 10, adopted by the House of Assembly of Newfoundland. The resolution was similarly agreed to in the House of Commons on June 23.

● (1630)

Honourable senators, in the circumstances, I would strongly suggest the adoption of the motion today, without the necessity of its being referred to committee.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

FRESHWATER FISHERIES

RESPONSE OF FEDERAL AND PROVINCIAL MINISTERS TO INTERIM REPORT OF FISHERIES COMMITTEE

Hon. Jack Marshall rose, pursuant to notice of Tuesday, June 23, 1987:

That he will call the attention of the Senate to the responses of the federal and provincial ministers to the recommendations made by the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries in its interim report on the freshwater fisheries.

He said: Honourable senators, I am pleased to have the opportunity to report on the responses of the federal Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and of the various provincial ministers responsible for the jurisdiction of the freshwater fisheries in the areas of Canada concerned with the recommendations made by the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries in its interim report on the freshwater sector of the industry.

Before dealing with the responses, I offer as background some of the introductory notes from the report, which put forward for the consideration of industry and governments proposals which we hope will facilitate the marketing of Canadian freshwater fish.

Although the freshwater fishing industry in Canada is a relatively minor contributor to the GNP and employs only a small fraction of the labour force, some remote communities in the north are more dependent on commercial freshwater fishing than some parts of the Atlantic provinces, and it is important to stress their local significance in the isolated northern areas where up to 90 per cent of fishermen are of native origin and where the lack of alternative employment makes such communities more dependent on the fishery, even though it represents only 6 per cent of the total Canadian fishery.

Statistics for 1985—the latest figures that were available at the time—indicate that the landed value of the inland fisheries was $61.6 million against the value of the sea fisheries, which at the time was well over $1 billion and is now over $2 billion. The employment statistics showed that some 8,392 fishermen were involved.

Our study of the freshwater fishery took us to the northern communities of the Northwest Territories and the Hay River, to Lac la Ronge in Saskatchewan, to Lac la Biche in Alberta, to Thompson and Ashern in Manitoba, and also to Winnipeg, where we visited the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation.

May I also comment that the Ontario and western regions—the areas of our examination—produce 97 per cent of both the quantity and the landed value of the freshwater fish harvested in Canada.

In the freshwater fishing industry there are two parallel regimes operating in those two regional fisheries. First is the Ontario region, which can be described as a mosaic of private sector organizations, characterized by a wide range of fishing operations which catch, process and market the available fish. The free enterprise concept of marketing prevails, and pricing is the essence of the competition for the local producer.

The western region, which takes in the Northwest Territories, Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, operates mainly through a crown corporation—namely, the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation, which, as a single selling desk operation, collects, processes and markets some 23 species of fish listed in the Freshwater Fish Marketing Act.

The federal Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the Honourable Tom Siddon, responded in a letter dated January 13, 1987; he stated that:

The recommendations of the committee are useful for freshwater fish marketing and, in fact, initiatives are already underway with the Department of Fisheries and Oceans and the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation to address many of the important issues raised in the report.

The minister also agreed that the role of the Department of Fisheries and Oceans in analyzing the domestic market is an important one—recommendation number (2)—stating that additional efforts in the area “could be triggered in the future by developments in traditional export markets.” The need for promotion to stimulate domestic demand for freshwater fish was also recognized—which was contained in our recommendations (15) and (18c).

The minister agreed that, first, variable pricing in the western region should be expanded—recommendation number (5); second, that the consultation between the FFMC and provincial officials, when establishing quotas, could be improved—recommendation (6a); third, that cooperation between governments and the FFMC is needed to balance investments in harvesting facilities and the number of participants, given the harvestable quantities of fish—recommendation (8b); and, fourth, that stock enhancement of commercial species of fish should be given serious consideration—recommendation (9b). The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans agreed with those recommendations.

It was said that recommendations related to fish habitat, such as compensation for fishermen who lose their livelihood because of industry projects, would be addressed, pursuant to the department's new policy on fish habitat. That was contained in recommendations (10a) and (10b).

There were, on the other hand, expressions of disagreement from DFO and the provinces to some of the report's proposals with respect to the government's role in promoting fish consumption and in developing markets—which was contained in recommendation (20). But this, however, overlooks the fact that although generic promotion is now largely the responsibility of the private sector, the federal government indeed provides funding on a shared-cost basis. For example, during 1986-87 contributions of $400,000 and $275,000 were made to the Seafood Advisory Council and to the Fisheries Council of British Columbia, respectively.

Also, the minister disagreed with the recommendations for changing some aspects of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation's operations, such as the licensing of rough-fish operators. “Rough fish” refers to underutilized species such as carp, mullet and burbot. He also disagreed with the call for the classification of the FFMC's whitefish pool into quality grades, and recommended a pilot project in the Northwest Territories designed to assess whether private enterprise has the capability to revitalize the declining fisheries of the Territories. Those were recommendations (4a), (12) and (13b).

I might say, honourable senators, that even though there was disagreement, fishermen in the Northwest Territories were highly in favour of this recommendation, which is reflected in their response to the recommendations with which I now propose to deal.

So, taking into account provincial jurisdictions, I offer, first, comments made by the Minister of Renewable Resources for the Northwest Territories. The Honourable Red Pedersen, in his letter of May 19, said:

In response to recommendation (12), which called for the whitefish species pool to be classified into appropriate categories according to the quality grades of the whitefish caught and marketed, the minister felt that “This would allow for a better return to Northwest Territories for the higher quality fish.”

The minister also agreed with recommendation (13B), which suggested that the territorial and federal governments cooperate in licensing a few individuals or groups to purchase and market species from the territorial harvest. Furthermore, he went along with the suggestion made in the text that Arctic char would be the logical choice for such an experiment. The minister congratulated the committee on its report and indicated that he looked forward to the implementation of the recommendations.

● (1640)

The comments made by the Saskatchewan Minister of Parks, Recreation and Culture, the Honourable Colin Maxwell, were equally encouraging. While he took exception to several points, he stated that on the whole the report provided valuable suggestions relating to the future of the freshwater fishery. Here is a quotation from the minister:

I believe the development of a new approach to resource allocation must be sought. Saskatchewan intends to embark on such a process shortly. A major facet of this will entail developing better communications between all levels of government, the FFMC, commercial fishermen and other fishery users.

The minister referred in his response to the 20 recommendations of the report, which are too lengthy to list today. I mention this to indicate that the same remarks are directed to the responses of the Minister of Resources in Ontario, the Honourable Vincent G. Kerrio, who responded to 15 of the recommendations. I shall highlight his responses to (14e) and (18b). (14e) reads:

Ontario processors in cooperation with the Department of Natural Resources investigated the possibility of processing fish from the more remote areas of Northern Ontario (including those currently under FFMC jurisdiction).

The minister's response is:

Ontario is assessing the applicability of processing fish in remote areas. The major problems curtailing such facilities are low volumes of fish, high transportation costs, reduced marketing ability and quality standards. The present Ontario policy on commercial harvest is one of a balanced harvest as now practised under FFMC and we feel a policy allowing remote processing may precipitate high-grading of the fisheries resources.

Recommendation 18(B) reads:

The Ontario Council of Commercial Fisheries, in cooperation with other industry associations such as the Ontario Fish Producers Association undertake to develop and promote the sale of freshwater fish in the major super-market chains in Ontario.

We are referring here, of course, to domestic marketing. The response is:

The ministry understands that the development and promotion of the sale of freshwater fish is being sponsored through the Seafood Advisory Council. Also, Department of Fisheries and Oceans is contributing funds to the Ontario Fish Producers Association for product promotion.

The Honourable Don Sparrow, Minister of Forestry, Lands and Wildlife of Alberta, responded to only three of the recommendations; stock enhancement, (9b); allocation of game species to commercial fishermen to enhance incomes, (9c); and (10a), which recommended that DFO, in collaboration with the Department of Environment, continue its evaluation and monitoring with respect to all industrial projects that might affect fish or their habitats; and his assessment of the report is reflected in these comments:

For the most part I agree with, and support, the minister's responses. As Mr. Siddon points out there are many presently ongoing changes to our respective regulatory and management programs which address quite a number of the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries' recommendations. Among the most constructive efforts in the past 10 years is the much increased dialogue which has begun between fisheries' ministers and our senior fisheries' officials. Mr. Siddon has been instrumental in this and is to be commended for his leadership.

Honourable senators, only one of the provinces has not responded as yet, but it was not because of a lack of interest. In a conversation with the Office of the Honourable Leonard Harapiak of Manitoba last week, I was advised that they were under the impression that a response was to be sent out. Another one has been sent, but we have not received it yet. This is regrettable, because Manitoba is one of the main players in the freshwater fishery, and the location of the Freshwater Fish Marketing Corporation is in Winnipeg. Unfortunately, it is too late to include their response in my inquiry today, but I am sure it can be included in a subsequent report that the committee will be tabling.

In conclusion, I would like to say that the responses of the provinces concerned and the Department of Fisheries and Oceans contain valuable comments that will not be ignored and that will assist us in our future deliberations and in the formulation of our final recommendations.

I apologize for introducing my comments so late, but the fact is that not all of the responses were received until recently, and I felt that it was important to put them on record before the summer recess. However, to save time, I have brushed over very lightly the responses concerned. I feel, however, that they are deserving of more attention and more explanation. In order to give the reports adequate and deserving recognition, I request that the responses of the governments concerned be tabled.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, if no other senator wishes to speak, I declare this inquiry debated.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, we are presently awaiting some legislation from the other place. The bill next on our list of expectations is Bill C-63. It is currently receiving third reading in the other place and will probably reach us in a little while.

Perhaps I can bring honourable senators up to date on what we are expecting this evening following Bill C-63. There is Bill C-80, which I am told deals with the Windsor tunnel. It is a companion piece to the private member's bill introduced by our colleague Senator Frith some time ago. Bill C-80 is a government bill which deals with safety features for that particular operation. Then we have Bill C-78, which is a farm loans bill. Bill C-62 should follow that bill. It deals with the write-offs of debts held by some countries because they are unable to repay them. This bill began in this place some time ago. It was found to be a money bill and, therefore, should have begun in the other place. We sent it back to the other place. It has been dealt with. We have pre-studied it, and now it is on its way back here again.

We will also receive Bill C-70, the Workplace Hazards Act, and there are one or two other bills dealing with the Customs Act and the House of Commons Act which might come here this afternoon or later this evening. However, we are not certain that they will reach us. If they do, I don't think it will take us long to deal with them.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

INQUIRY ON REPORT ON FILM ENTITLED "THE KID WHO COULDN'T MISS" REFERRED TO SOCIAL AFFAIRS, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY COMMITTEE

Leave having been given to revert to Order No. 16:

Resuming the debate on the inquiry of the Honourable Senator Marshall calling the attention of the Senate to the motion adopted by the Senate on May 28, 1986, and passed by a vote of 28 for and 17 against, that the Report of the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology entitled: Production and Distribution of the National Film Board Production "The Kid Who Couldn't Miss", tabled in the Senate on 15th April, 1986, be referred back to the Committee with instructions to consider and report upon the following:

Strike out page 20 and substitute

Recommendations

1. That after the titles of the film, the following disclaimer be added: "This film is a docu-drama and combines elements of both reality and fiction. It does not pretend to be an even-handed or chronological biography of Billy Bishop.

Although a Walter Bourne did serve as Bishop's mechanic, the film director has used this character to express his own doubts and reservations about Bishop's exploits. There is no evidence that these were shared by the real Walter Bourne."

2. That the National Film Board be requested to take action to eliminate from the film the unproven allegations, charges and innuendoes against the integrity of Billy Bishop; and further, that consideration be given to the apparent disregard by National Film Board officials to their commitments to the Senate Sub-committee on Veterans Affairs arising out of evidence before the Sub-committee.

And on the motion of the Honourable Senator Marshall, seconded by the Honourable Senator Le Moynes, that the inquiry be referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Social Affairs, Science and Technology for study and report.—(Honourable Senator Petten).

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, I wonder if Senator Frith has anything to say about this order.

[Senator Doody.]

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I discussed this matter with my colleagues today. We decided that one should make up one's own mind on this matter—I suppose a free vote is the right expression—and therefore it would not be a vote on which party position need be established. I believe that on such a vote the motion would probably carry. So, we could adopt the motion on division, which would send the matter to the committee and also protect the position of those who might wish to vote against it or to speak against it.

• (1650)

Honourable senators, I say that, but perhaps there is some senator who will not be prepared to give leave to do that. However, if there is anyone here in the chamber who wants to speak to the matter, he or she may. I know that Senator Gigantès has some views about it, but if he or anyone else is prepared to have the matter go on division, instead of having a recorded vote, then that would be satisfactory. However, I leave it up to any honourable senator who would rather demand a recorded vote.

Hon. Jean Le Moynes: Honourable senators, I said before that I would support the motion of Senator Marshall provided that it is understood that the committee will try to find some means other than censorship to put pressure on the National Film Board, because I agree fundamentally with the outrage felt by Senator Marshall and by the distinguished witnesses we heard in this committee.

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Honourable senators, I would like to support what Senator Le Moynes has just said. I would like the committee to be particularly careful not to give the impression of exercising censorship; nor would I like the committee to appear to be threatening to cut off the funds of the National Film Board, which has been the pride of Canada for its technical and intellectual achievements, simply because the Senate has a disagreement with the wrong labelling of one National Film Board production. In other words, I do not want it to appear that the Senate is attacking a cultural institution that is financed by the state.

Despite what the legislation says, I would not want it to appear that we are in any way intruding upon the intellectual freedom of such institutions, among which is the CBC, one of the very best television networks in the world. It has been the pride of this country to have been able to produce this kind of institution, which Senator Baroote obviously does not like. However, he and I have different tastes, so what can I do?

Senator Frith: Honourable senators will remember that I had some reservations about the original work of the committee and asked in committee for an amendment to its original suggestions. However, I supported the report as it appeared and I thought it was a reasonable request that the committee was making of the National Film Board. That board has chosen, apparently, to ignore that request, and, having listened to Senator Marshall's interventions on the motion, I was persuaded that his feelings are close to the context expressed by both Senator Gigantès and Senator Le Moynes. Therefore, I believe that the committee should find out why the National Film Board has totally ignored what was, it seemed to me, a very reasonable request.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I am merely asking that the matter be referred to the committee and then we can proceed from there.

Motion agreed to.

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-63, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I am pleased to present to the Senate Bill C-63, to amend the Small Businesses Loans Act. The amendment will make fishermen eligible for loans under the act. This is an urgently needed and important piece of legislation. Senator Corbin and I were watching television coverage of the passage of this bill in the other place and there were three amendments proposed which were lost on division.

Honourable senators will remember that the subject of guaranteed loans for fishermen was before us last December for consideration in another context. At the time, the government was seeking a six-month extension of authority to grant loans under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act.

That time was needed to consider a range of options for securing fishermen's access to guaranteed loans. There were shortcomings in the Fisheries Improvement Loan Program that were becoming more evident with every year. There was an obvious need for an approach that would do two things: first, meet the continued need of fishermen for guaranteed loan capital and, second, do so in ways that would encourage careful rather than careless borrowing and lending. The evaluation is now complete. The most desirable option to emerge from that process is embodied in the legislation now before us.

As honourable senators know, this bill has come before the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. The Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism appeared before the committee to explain the rationale and the context of the bill—he was accompanied by experts from his department and from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans. I notice that Senator Sinclair, chairman of that committee, is here listening intently. I may say that he conducted the committee's study of this bill very appropriately.

We were able, at this hearing and before it, to consider the effect of these changes on fishermen. We requested, and received, a detailed comparison of the salient characteristics of the two acts—loans ceilings, interest rates, total funding and others. I believe it is fair to say that the committee in general agreed that of the various options available, this was the best. Let me summarize some of the more prominent features that were compared in reaching this conclusion.

(1) Interest rates: These are the same in both acts: prime plus 1 per cent.

(2) Flexibility in the use of funds borrowed: Under the Small Businesses Loans Act, fishermen will enjoy new options. They will, for instance, be able to borrow money to purchase land connected with their business. This is besides the regular funds that were available under the act for the purchase of gear, to buy a vessel or to build a vessel.

(3) In the Small Businesses Loans Act, fishermen will be eligible for a more solid and predictable loan program, one with less potential for unpleasant surprises. As honourable senators know, both acts work on the principle of established loan periods and fixed loan limits.

One inconvenient feature of the FILA Program was its relatively short loan period. At the end of that time, the government would come to Parliament for an extension. It was very much a stop-and-start operation.

Another limiting factor was total funding for loans: Under FILA, it was $30 million a year. Once that limit was reached, even though the window of time might still be open, the lending window was closed because funding was exhausted.

Under the Small Businesses Loans Act, the lending window will be longer. For instance, the current five-year period ends in 1990. The total available for loans is not $30 million but $2.5 billion. That figure will, of course, be distributed among a larger number of potential borrowers. Even taking that into account, fishermen will have access to a larger fund. This does not guarantee, of course, that funding will never run out before the last applicant gets to the bank, but it will be less likely to happen.

(4) Another feature of the two acts that we compared was the percentage of the loan guaranteed. Under FILA, the government guarantees 100 per cent. Under the Small Businesses Loans Act, the guarantee is 85 per cent. This feature needs to be carefully evaluated. We have in different parts of Canada a recurring, even a chronic, problem of overcapacity in fishing fleets. Boats that should never have been built have been purchased with money which probably should never have been borrowed, or lent. It can be argued, of course, that lenders were less apt to exercise foresight or to counsel it to borrowers when 100 cents on the dollar were protected.

● (1700)

5. There is a difference in the dollar limit per loan. It is $150,000 under the Fishermen's Improvement Loans Act and only $100,000 under the Small Businesses Loans Act. This difference has to be evaluated in relation to the actual pattern of borrowing.

The record shows that loans over $100,000 have been unusual. In the five years ending in 1986, the average loan under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act was $18,000. Back to the start of the program in the 1950s—I think it was 1955—the average has been around $20,000. Last year loans over $100,000 made up only three per cent of the total. What about those three per cent? Where will these fishermen find loans? That is a reasonable question, and the answer is that other sources are available, such as the Federal Business Development Bank. For east coast fishermen a loan under the Atlantic Enterprise Program will soon be another option.

6. The payback time limit under the Small Businesses Loans Act is ten years compared with fifteen years under FILA. Again, examination of the record shows that this is not likely to be a problem, because the average payback time has been three years. There is a 1 per cent fee under the Small Businesses Loans Act which covers the cost of administration. Given the average loan amounts, these are not onerous charges. For a loan of $20,000, for instance, we are talking about a fee of $200.

I have one final point, honourable senators. There will be no change in the status of loans already guaranteed under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act. The act will remain on the books while loans are outstanding. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans will continue to administer those loans, and the new loans will be administered by the Department of Regional and Industrial Expansion.

Honourable senators, bringing fishermen under the umbrella of an act designed to help small businesses makes sense. The fishermen who need these loans are in small business. Like others in this sector, access to low interest credit is the breath of economic life. The opening of the Small Businesses Loans Act program to fishermen will guarantee that access and, at the same time, promote care and foresight in lending. Honourable senators, passage of this act will make these features available to fishermen with a minimum of interruption. I recommend we give this matter rapid and positive consideration.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, in William Shakespeare's play Hamlet, act II, scene 2—and I just picked this off the fireplace in the reading room a few minutes ago—one of the characters says:

There is nothing either good or bad but thinking makes it so.

I have done a little bit of thinking with respect to Bill C-63. I cannot say I find anything terribly bad with the bill, but it is a change of focus; it is a change in emphasis with respect to services to fishermen. Up to this point in time, fishermen have been able to look to their program and its administrators as part of their general bailiwick. They looked to the administrators of that program as people who understood their particular needs. They related to the banking and the loan trade people as people who understood their particular needs, and, in fact, that aspect will not change at all.

Nevertheless, there is a dimension that disappears today. The recognition of the special needs of fishermen who are now being lumped under Bill C-63, and who will be considered with the rest of the small business sector, manufacturing, the wholesale trade, the retail trade, service businesses, construction, transportation, communications. I understand that the government has just introduced a bill in the other place to include under this particular umbrella the farming community. It is my understanding that the bill was just introduced a few minutes ago, so I am not cognizant of exactly what it contains. In other words, fishermen, in terms of small commercial operations, are now part of the overall Canadian landscape of small business. They have been lumped in with the rest. I am sure they feel a sense of loss of special identity, an identity that goes as far back as 1935 when the government of the day introduced the Canadian Fishermen's Loans Act. It was not a terribly successful program, because in the 20-year period under that particular act a total of 79 loans totalling $40,000 were involved. Nevertheless, that was replaced in 1945 by the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act, which is the program that I should not say is being discontinued, but it disappears under its very special designation, to be lumped in with the Small Businesses Loans Act administration.

The Fisheries Improvement Loans Act was rather successful, because from 1955 to March 1986 a total of 18,198 loans totalling $246 million were made out to the small fishermen's interests. Therefore, it has been a rather successful operation. There is so much more risk involved in fishermen's operations than in the other component of the small business enterprise in Canada, and I would express the wish that that not be lost sight of in the reshuffling process that is occurring today. They are subject to the inclemencies of weather; they are subject to marine disasters, and so on.

I hope that the people who administer this program, and I hope that the lenders who, in fact, take the risk of lending money to the fishermen, will not forget that special particular feature of the fishing industry, which is one that we, who have a maritime orientation, attach a great deal of importance to.

The departmental press release which dealt with the announcement of the absorption of the Fisheries Improvement Loans Act attempted to make a big deal out of very little, in my view. The minister was quoted as saying that under the Small Businesses Loans Act, fishermen will even be able to borrow funds for a wide variety of needs when, in fact, the only added feature is that they may be able to borrow money to buy land. The rest is already available.

As has been said earlier, the amount of the fund is vastly increased from $30 million to $2.5 billion, but that does not significantly add anything as far as the fishermen are concerned. They will be competing with all of the other sectors of the small business community which I named a few moments ago. All in all, keeping in mind what Shakespeare had to say, that "there is nothing either good or bad but thinking makes it so," I feel that I have made my point. I regret to see the special designation dropped; I hope that the program will continue to be administered with a generous heart. Perhaps, as a final note, I regret that the government has decided to take a 1 per cent up-front fee. It is not a large one when you are dealing with a small amount, but if you are dealing with the full amount, it is $1,000, and $1,000 is quite a fee.

• (1710)

Having said that, honourable senators, I would like to congratulate Senator Sinclair's committee, which thoroughly pre-studied the legislation; I congratulate Senator Marshall, my beloved chairman of the Fisheries Committee, for the outline he gave to the house. I believe it should proceed unchallenged through all remaining stages in this house.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Marshall speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Marshall: Honourable senators, I welcome the remarks of Senator Corbin. Having been heavily involved, as a member of Parliament, with the fishermen of the west coast of Newfoundland, I ran into many situations involving loans under the Fisheries Improvement Loans Program, and, indeed, represented a lot of fishermen before the banks.

It appears that his comment is real in that we are lumping in the fishermen with other small businessmen. However, fishermen are becoming confused with all of the programs that are available, and I think this will probably be helpful. Fishermen will know that if it is a small business loan, they can go and get a loan with more adequate funds. More importantly, there was extensive consultation on both the east and west coasts on this program, which included consultation with the Atlantic Regional Council. I am sure, with his experience in fisheries and the Fisheries Committee, that we can watch to ensure that the bill is directed towards the benefit of the fishermen of all of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. Jack Marshall: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

WINDSOR-DETROIT TUNNEL—MESSAGE FROM COMMONS

The Hon. the Acting Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons returning Bill S-11, respecting the acquisition, operation and disposal of the Windsor-Detroit Tunnel by the City of Windsor, and acquainting the Senate that they had passed the bill without amendment.

CUSTOMS ACT

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-80, to amend the Customs Act.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, just a word to introduce this bill to the Senate for second reading. The bill is a companion piece to Bill S-11, the private member's bill dealing with the Windsor-Detroit Tunnel, which was introduced in this place a little while ago by Senator Frith and passed, sent to the House of Commons and returned to us, now passed, in this place.

The Government of Canada has seen fit to offer an amendment to the Customs Act. Bill C-80 deals with the safety conditions, working conditions and facilities at international bridges and tunnels, with the priority directed at this particular facility at Detroit-Windsor.

I have little other information than that on this. I think that Senator Frith is far more familiar with this particular situation than I am. I simply move second reading and ask him to give us the benefit of his knowledge.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I can say that, as Senator Doody has said, this bill has application to Bill S-11 which was passed a few moments ago. But, as Senator Doody has also said, it is of general application.

The current Customs Act that is amended here was enacted in the Statutes of Canada, 1986, Chapter 1. Sections 5 and 6 in the original act deal with customs offices and facilities. The purpose of this bill to amend the Customs Act is to amend section 6 in order to do four things: one, to allow the government to make regulations determining what are adequate customs facilities at bridge and tunnel border crossings; two, to specify that facilities that do not meet the health and safety requirements of the Canada Labour Code are not adequate facilities; three, to allow the government to upgrade inadequate facilities to adequate standards; and, four, to make the owner or operator of the bridge or tunnel liable for the reasonable costs of the government in upgrading the inadequate facilities.

The last part can be of some interest to the City of Windsor in view of the fact that the scope of the act extends to the Windsor-Detroit Tunnel as an international tunnel for the use of which a toll is payable. So its amendments will apply to the City of Windsor when and if it becomes the owner of the tunnel.

There are a couple of problems, however, that have been raised by the researchers. There is sort of bad news and good news. The bad news really concerns some areas in which I have placed a question mark.

The first question is whether the minister should, under subsection 6(5), be required to specify in the notice the deficiencies that need to be corrected so that the owner or operator, during the 30-day notice period, has the chance to do the improvements himself. As it stands, the minister simply has to give notice that he intends to carry out the construction or repairs. There might be some objection to it on that basis.

The other thing is that subsection 6(6) raises the issue of whether, after the City of Windsor becomes the owner and operator of the tunnel, Her Majesty in right of Canada will be able to enforce a debt recovery against Windsor, as a public body. There is a question mark there on the bad side of the bill if this is so.

The timelessness of the act to amend the Customs Act is a comfort to the City of Windsor, as any work that needs to be done in the customs reception area of the tunnel in Windsor could be completed by the minister and paid for by the company that is the current owner of the tunnel. The City of Windsor could get comfort in that context.

● (1720)

There is also a technical problem with respect to the liability for the cost of improvements in subsection (6), but that is really a problem for the government as to whether they can effectively do so under the provisions of the act. I have had suggested to me an amendment which might clarify that shadowy area, but I do not think, on balance, it is appropriate to put forward that amendment at this stage of the proceedings.

On the balance of the goods and the bads in the bill, I find that the goods come out ahead. Therefore, I recommend that we pass the bill.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: Honourable senators, just as a historical footnote, I think senators might be interested to know that the Windsor-Detroit tunnel was originally conceived, financed and sponsored by a group of Canadians, mainly Torontonians, including some lawyers whose names I will not mention. It, the tunnel company, went bankrupt in 1929, with the result that three or four of the directors of that company jumped off high buildings and bridges. I hope that today we are not seeing that sort of trauma being imposed on people by government agencies.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Doody speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, even if I do not speak, I suspect that in this particular instance it will close the debate. I thank honourable senators for their comments and I commend the bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Senator Doody: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Acting Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, while we await the next item on the menu, Bill C-78, the Farm Improvement and Marketing Co-operatives Loans Bill, which is currently in Committee of the Whole in the other place, I suggest it might be advisable that we adjourn for an hour and come back here at approximately 6:30 p.m.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Are they going to keep working through over there?

Senator Doody: My understanding is that they are.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Is there a firm time set for Royal Assent?

Senator Doody: We have tentatively set Royal Assent for 9 o'clock this evening. My understanding is that the House of Commons has set 8 o'clock this evening as their target time for cutoff. I would think that whatever they have dealt with will be sent to us at that time. Therefore, I think 9 o'clock is as good a guess as any for Royal Assent.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Senator Doody has suggested that we adjourn until 6:30 p.m. Could we perhaps adjourn to the call of the bell so that we know that the bill has arrived in this place? If it is still in the Committee of the Whole in the other place, they may not be through with it at 6:30 p.m.

Senator Doody: I suggest that we adjourn until 6:30 p.m. or to the call of the bell.

The Senate adjourned during pleasure.

● (1830)

At 6.30 p.m. the sitting of the Senate was resumed.

FARM IMPROVEMENT AND MARKETING COOPERATIVES LOANS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-78, to increase the availability of loans for the purpose of the improvement and development of farms and the processing, distribution or marketing of farm products by cooperative associations, to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act and to amend certain other acts in consequence thereof.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I welcome the opportunity to speak today on Bill C-78, which proposes to amend the Farm Improvement Loans Act. I will refer to it as FILA, similar to the nomenclature used by Senator Marshall.

In its current form, FILA authorizes the Minister of Agriculture to guarantee against losses on term loans made to farmers by chartered banks, by the Alberta Treasury Branches and by other designated lenders. The maximum lending rate is 1 per cent above prime. The program offers loans to buy machinery, implements, livestock, major repairs to equipment or buildings, or even to purchase additional land. It complements the Farm Credit Corporation lending program, which, among other things, offers start-up capital.

Farming, by its very nature, is capital intensive. That is why farmers require reliable access to reasonable credit. Very few farmers could survive without access to some kind of credit—start-up capital, operating credit and term loans to cover their machinery and equipment expenses. This is what the Farm Improvement Loans Act provides. Fortunately, there exists in Canada a wide range of credit options for farmers through lending institutions and through provincial and federal programs. Each program fulfils a specific need, and FILA is part of that network. So the program is really important to many farmers. It is also true, however, that in the 42 years since the original act was introduced, FILA has become somewhat less important in the credit field. There are many reasons for this change. For instance, provincial governments have entered the agricultural lending field in a variety of ways. Banks and other lending institutions have also set up specialized programs for farm lending. We should encourage banks and other lenders to continue searching for new ways to meet the special credit requirements of our farmers.

Aside from that, however, I believe that FILA must continue to exist. Moreover, I believe that its role must be enhanced, and that the purpose of this legislation is exactly that. However, it should be understood that the changes proposed by Bill C-78 represent only one aspect of an overall government response to the financial and credit needs of Canadian farmers.

The causes of today's farm financial problems are well known. High interest rates in the early 1980s crippled many farm operations. Some of them have not yet fully recovered. In addition, low commodity prices brought on by an international subsidy war coupled with increased input costs have reduced grain farmers' incomes.

The Government of Canada believes that greater farm income stability in this country will grow out of an overall effort. The effort must, first of all, provide farmers with a variety of flexible credit options. Second, it must provide them with financial assistance when necessary. Third, it must place greater emphasis on marketing. Indeed, the federal government has taken significant action in all of these areas.

Government support of marketing efforts has been strengthened. Numerous steps have been taken to improve the flexibility and availability of credit for farmers. The federal government has taken extraordinary action to address the special financial needs of the farm community. The purpose of Bill C-78 is to build further on these many initiatives.

The intention of this legislation is to broaden the scope of FILA and to make it a more flexible and accessible farm credit tool. I expect that these changes will result in expanding FILA's importance in the farm credit area.

In keeping with the government's added emphasis on marketing, Bill C-78 proposes to guarantee loans for cooperatives that have been set up by farmers to process, market and distribute their commodities. In order to reflect this expansion in the scope of the program, the act will be renamed the Farm Improvement and Marketing Cooperatives Loans Act.

The new provision will enable the federal government to assist a group of farmers who are willing to diversify their operations by taking the initiative to market their own products cooperatively.

These cooperatives have been and are being established by enterprising farmers who discovered that it is getting very difficult to sell traditional raw product in the marketplace. The traditional markets are not as secure as they used to be. Some customers are looking for different kinds of products and consumer habits are changing.

For all of these reasons farmers can no longer rely exclusively on the old standby markets or on the old standby products. In this regard, farm cooperatives have considerable and perhaps tremendous potential for developing new products, and developing new markets for these products.

By extending the guaranteed loan program to farmer cooperatives, the federal government is assisting and encouraging diversification and ingenuity in the farm sector. And that is a key to unlocking the door to greater prosperity in our farm industry. These new loan guarantees will not stand alone. They add a new element to the federal government's existing marketing assistance scheme for farm cooperatives. As a result, farm cooperatives will not only have access to the operating assistance already available under existing programs but they will also have access to capital assistance in order to get started.

● (1840)

Other provisions of Bill C-78 are also important to the farm community, and I would like to take a few moments to outline some of them. The bill proposes to increase the borrowing limit from $100,000 to $250,000. This is a more realistic reflection of the cost of today's farming machinery and equipment.

It also proposes to extend the definition of a "farmer" to include producers who have off-farm employment. This change is in recognition of the financial circumstances facing many of today's farmers who have sought off-farm employment in order to keep their operations viable. Under the old definition, these loans were really available only to those defined as "full-time farmers".

There is also a new refinancing option which will allow farmers to consolidate their loans. Farmers with a number of intermediate-term outstanding loans will have the opportunity to consolidate them. In cases where the refinance loan extends the average term of the original loans, the annual payments shall be smaller. This will serve to increase the farmers' cash flow during this period.

The refinancing option also allows farmers to benefit from temporary low or interest-free provisions when they are buying farm machinery. When low or interest-free loan terms expire, they can refinance with a guaranteed loan at the favourable rate of prime plus 1 per cent.

The amendments I have outlined will give more farmers an opportunity to secure loan capital. I am confident that the program will better suit today's needs in our farm communities.

Two further amendments are proposed in Bill C-78. The first is called a cost recovery fee. It proposes a minimal user fee of 1/2 of 1 per cent. That is a small amount in relationship to the benefits of the guaranteed loan at a favourable interest rate of 1 over prime.

[Senator Barrootes.]

The principle of a user fee has been widely applied to the delivery of many of our government services in Canada. Small businesses have been paying a service fee for government guaranteed loans under the Small Business Loans Act, and in fact it is 1 per cent.

Honourable senators may ask how the 1/2 of 1 per cent came into being. Over the 42 years of the existence of the Farm Loans Act, the loss ratio has been 1/2 of 1 per cent. In the last three years, unfortunately, with the farm crisis that faces us, that has gone up to slightly over 1 per cent. However, it was decided that the fee be based not on that higher loss ratio under the FILA program but on the lower expected losses in the longer term and on an historical basis, as the farm financial situation is expected to improve. In that sense, the government has taken into account the difficulty facing many of our farmers today.

The bill also proposes that lending institutions be responsible for 5 per cent of the risk on a loan whereas under the current act the federal government guaranteed 100 per cent of the loan. We have just heard that in the fisheries loan undertaking the guarantee is on 85 per cent of the loan. This will be on 95 per cent. It was felt appropriate that where lenders are provided with loan guarantees, they should at least take a small part of the risk.

Again, it should be noted that lenders have been sharing the losses on loans to small businesses since April 1985. I am confident that the provision contained in this bill will not create a significant disincentive to lenders; and it will certainly be a more fairly distributable responsibility to the lending institutions.

In conclusion, FILA has been a useful tool for farmers over the past 42 years. But times have changed. The act needs updating in order to meet today's reality in the farm sector, and that is what the bill proposes to do.

I should point out that the upper limit of funds available under this act will be raised to $1.5 billion. The present amount of money at risk is about $466 million. The average expected in new loans each year ranges between $160 million to $200 million; and therefore, with the ceiling of $1.5 billion and with the roll-overs that occur, it is pretty obvious that we shall not have to, as we have been doing in the past, return to this chamber and to the House of Commons to have an extension of the period, as I believe was done last December.

So making it the $1.5 billion and allowing it to have the roll-over will probably carry it through for a considerable period of time.

By taking this kind of initiative the government is creating a more meaningful and useful credit tool for farmers. The legislation is the result of extensive review undertaken by Agriculture Canada. It is the result of many consultations with the farm community.

The changes proposed in Bill C-78, together with the federal government's many other farm credit, farm financial and farm marketing efforts—which are the product of many governments, provincial and federal—are resulting in a more effective network of programs for Canadian farmers.

Honourable senators, I am confident that this legislation will be of benefit to our farm community. It is well worth your full support, and I commend it to you.

Hon. Daniel A. Lang: I wonder if I may ask the honourable senator a question arising out of my abundance of knowledge of the farming community! When a government agency lends money under the Farm Implements Loan Act, does the government take a chattel mortgage on the implements?

Senator Barootes: Indeed, the government does not take a chattel mortgage. The mortgage is taken by the lending institution, be it a credit union, a bank, or so on.

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, Bill C-78 is one that I, too, recommend that we pass today for the simple reason that the old one that was in existence expires today. Therefore, I think we should pass it. As Senator Barootes, the sponsor of the bill, has pointed out, this bill, or this program, has been around for approximately 40 years and it has proven to be one of the most satisfactory that I know of—that is, from the point of view of the farmer—in the way that he obtains the credit, mostly from the chartered banks, although there are some other institutions, such as credit unions, which have extended the credit recently. It is more satisfactory than any other loan program that I know of—and I have also heard the same thing said about the Fisheries Improvement Act and others—because it is set up in such a way that it is administered in almost every community where there is that kind of activity going on—in this case agriculture.

However, having said that, I can find very little to agree with in what Senator Barootes had to say about this bill. For example, he said that farmers were still suffering from interest rates from the early 1980s and that many of them had not recovered—attempting to leave the impression that it is because of what happened then that farmers have such severe farm debt service problems today.

I completely disagree with that. What has happened is that the income, the revenue which farmers have lost in the past three years particularly, since 1984, is what has caused all of the problems. They simply do not get enough revenue from the sale of grain any more to service the obligations they have, whether they be debt service charges or other costs. The government knows very well that gross farm income for grain producers has dropped by 40 per cent to 50 per cent since it came into office. I do not know whether it wants to accept the blame for this loss in gross income to farmers, but I think it should at least admit to the reason for the loss. I think that a whole lot more could have been done by this government, as governments have done over the past number of decades, to keep the international market viable. However, this has not happened in the past three years. Instead, we have seen a ratcheting down of grain prices through those years.

● (1850)

The sponsor of the bill said that the government has taken some extraordinary action to help the farm credit situation.

What extraordinary action has this government taken, except to drop the provision to have a moratorium on foreclosures? It has done just about everything else to make it as difficult as possible for farmers who are in desperate financial straits to meet their obligations, especially when grain prices dropped so drastically. For weeks I have been asking the government in this chamber, “What are you going to do to relieve the situation?” Last year it came along with a program offering some offsetting acreage payments. Even then they admitted that it was something less than one-third the amount farm income in the grain sector fell by, but, nevertheless, they said, “One billion dollars is a lot of money, and that is all we can put together.” Now half of 1987 has gone by and, in spite of questions asked in the other place and in this place as to what the government is going to do for 1987, there has been no reply at all.

Honourable senators, this is serious. As bad as the situation was last year, it is at least 20 per cent worse this year. The initial prices on wheat and barley have been reduced by 18 to 27 per cent. So I do not know what the honourable senator means by “extraordinary action to take care of the situation.” If the consequences of the government’s extraordinary action is an indication of how valuable it was, then I suggest that it stop it. There is more distress in the agriculture sector today as a direct result of debt servicing charges than at any other time. Most of it has happened since this government came to office. They say, “Well, it is the international market situation that has caused it, and there is nothing we can do about it. We are doing all we can about it.” The results of all their promises so far has been a big zero. The only result we can see is farm prices going down and down and down.

The government has not even announced a program for this year that is equivalent to the one they announced for last year. As a matter of fact, when the premiers met in, I believe, Humboldt, Saskatchewan, they said the very least that would be acceptable in acreage deficiency payments for this year was a program involving $1.6 billion. The federal government has not come through with it. So, by way of general criticism of what this government has done, honourable senators can probably understand where I am coming from.

Some of the provisions of Bill C-78 are good. I accept that and I think we should pass it. However, I do not think we should try to sell the bill on the idea that the government has done a lot to relieve stress in the agricultural area, particularly as far as debt service charges are concerned. One thing the government has done in this bill is to raise the application fee to 1/2 of 1 per cent. The excuse they give is that this is now the amount of the losses of the past 40 years, or whatever. Until three years ago the loss was 1/10 of 1 per cent.

Senator Barootes: No.

Senator Olson: No, 1/10 of 1 per cent. It has gone up to over 1 per cent in the past three years. If you are going to average that out, go back into the 1970s and the average will drop to 1/2 of 1 per cent. For the previous 30 to 35 years of the program, the average was 1/10 of 1 per cent. One half of 1 per cent does not sound like very much, but if a farmer has applied for $100,000, which is the limit now, it amounts to $500. If you are broke already, that is a lot of money. If you are having great difficulty in paying your grocery bill, your taxes, and so on, $500 amounts to a lot of money. I do not understand why the government is introducing this measure. It was not there before.

This kind of convoluted reasoning the government uses in saying what is good is beyond me. Why would they stick a farmer for another $500 when he is having a terrible time looking after his debt service charges now? This is considered good service? My gosh!

The other thing the government is doing in this bill is transferring 5 per cent of the risk factor over and above what was there before to the lending institution. I am not sure that the explanation given was intended to be misleading, but I suspect that if the sponsor of the bill were to go back and ask for a better explanation, he would find out that the government is talking about 5 per cent over all, not 5 per cent on each individual loan. This proposition creates a completely different situation. Honourable senators can figure it out for themselves, but on $1.5 billion the lending institutions are taking on a pretty substantial risk factor. The sponsor admitted that it was a disincentive. I ask honourable senators; why do it at all knowing that farmers are having a more difficult time than ever before in looking after debt service charges? Why stick on another disincentive by transferring 5 per cent of the gross amount as a risk factor to the lending institutions when in the past the government has assumed all the risk? If that is taking extraordinary action to be helpful in the farm credit situation at a critical time, to me it is a complete contradiction in terms. It is making things more difficult, not less difficult. I know that earlier today some attempts were made to amend the bill to remove the 1/2 of 1 per cent fee.

One other thing that has not been explained with regard to that 1/2 of 1 per cent fee is that every time a farmer goes back to have the loan renewed, he will probably have to pay the 1/2 of 1 per cent over again because of the new application. If what Senator Barootes has said about the amount going from $100,000 up to $250,000 is true, it means that there could be an application fee of $1,250 each time the loan is renewed. That is not helpful.

● (1900)

In any event, the old act expires today, and, as I have said, over the past 40 years up until at least the last three years, this has been one of the most useful farm credit policies that has been in effect. Therefore, honourable senators, I intend to support this bill simply because I do not think that the program should die today. However, as far as there being anything helpful in the bill in relation to someone who is already deeply involved in trying desperately to hang on to what he has got, there is nothing helpful. I agree that adding cooperatives and other changes of that nature could be helpful, but for the individual farmer who is already in difficulty, let us not kid ourselves that there is anything in Bill C-78 that will help him. In fact, it will simply make matters worse.

[Senator Olson.]

In any event, rather than let the program die, I recommend that we pass Bill C-78 so that the program has a continuity of life on the statute books of this country.

Hon. Dan Hays: Honourable senators, I would like to add a few words to those of Senator Barootes and Senator Olson. To begin with, I urge honourable senators to pass Bill C-78. It is very much needed at a time of distress in the agricultural sector. I will make a couple of comments about that and a couple of comments about the bill itself.

Essentially, I regret that the bill did not come before the Senate so that we might have had an opportunity to look at some of the provisions of the bill in committee and give it the due consideration that the Senate, I think, would like to have given to it.

As to my first point, I would like to draw to the attention of honourable senators the fact that farm debt doubled between 1975 and 1980 from $8 billion to $16 billion. In the current year farm debt is of the order of $22 billion. That is quite a remarkable increase, honourable senators, in the debt load that farms are carrying in something just over a ten-year period. During that ten-year period we experienced very high interest rates for a portion of the time. In 1981 interest payments alone for agriculture reached $2.4 billion; in 1986 interest payments were around $1.4 billion.

Another statistic that I would like to draw to the attention of honourable senators, derived from the Farm Credit Corporation, is that approximately 30 per cent of farmers are under financial stress. Eight per cent of those farmers are insolvent and the balance are facing severe financial difficulty. Therefore, honourable senators, my approach to this piece of legislation is that it is welcome. We need to do a great deal more to address the needs of the farm sector in terms of government policy with respect to the granting of credit of this nature, and of course the Standing Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry is currently conducting a study of that subject and hopes to report no later than January 31 of next year.

As to Bill C-78, some of the things that I would like to have had an opportunity to discuss with officials of the department relate to such things as the statement by Senator Barootes to the effect that under the Farm Improvement Loans Act, interest rates were 1 per cent over prime. Honourable senators, I do not have that act before me, but looking at the bill which we are being asked to pass today I see that provision is made in that bill for establishment of interest rates by regulation. The fee that Senator Olson talked about can be changed by regulation. There are many things that are adjustable by the executive branch of the government by regulation, and I must say that that kind of thing is worthy of inquiry before legislation is passed to fix, as a matter of evidence in a committee, the kind of range that the executive branch has in mind when this or similar legislation is implemented. It is interesting to note that the only item in the bill that will come into force tomorrow is the extension of the Farm Improvement Loans Act. The rest of the bill will come into force at a date to be proclaimed at some time in the future. Honourable senators, it is quite possible—or even probable—that the government could have extended the Farm Improvement Loans Act and brought in the rest of this legislation at a later date so that it could have received the scrutiny of Parliament—not only of the Senate but of the House of Commons.

As I say, honourable senators, these provisions bother me somewhat. I do not think there is anything new in this bill, but I do think that we as parliamentarians, both in this house and in the other place, should be very wary of the extent to which acts are mere shams in that, because of provisions in them that allow the executive to change the heart of the act, they can basically be terminated without reference to Parliament. In other words, they can sit around on the books for some later Parliament to eventually do away with.

Honourable senators, those are my comments on Bill C-78. I think everything else has been adequately covered in terms of the description of the bill, as I understand it in the short period of time that I have had to examine it. It increases the limits of loans; it increases the total amount of funds available from roughly $400,000 outstanding now to $1.5 billion, and it allows loans of up to $3 million to organizations that are going to upgrade or value-add to agricultural commodities. These are all things which give me a very positive feeling about the bill and a positive feeling about the initiative of the government in bringing it forward.

In saying that, I do not take away from my criticisms of the manner in which it has been brought forward and the speed with which we have been asked to deal with it. I would not suggest that it was designed to go through quickly so that it would not attract a lot of attention here or in the House of Commons or in committee. However, I hope that in the future this government—and all governments—will provide more time for legislation such as this—albeit good legislation—to be scrutinized and possibly improved.

Honourable senators, I commend the legislation to you at this time.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators—

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, I wish to inform the Senate that if the Honourable Senator Barootes speaks now, his speech will have the effect of closing the debate on the motion for second reading of this bill.

Senator Frith: You do not have to speak; you are entitled to waive it.

Senator Barootes: I appreciate the help of the honourable senator, but I think I would like to make one or two comments. First of all, I would like to thank my two Alberta confrères for their observations which, as usual, have some validity and some cogency. In particular, Senator Hays is absolutely right on two points. I, too, am sad that we did not receive this legislation at an earlier date so that he and his committee and the Senate could investigate it a little further. However, that is the way it has gone. Perhaps in the future your admonition and that of others will have the effect that some of this legislation reaches us in more timely fashion.

My second point is that the proclamation date in clause (b) is delayed, and it will be proclaimed when the rules and regulations under the bill have been prepared and have been consulted upon with the farm organizations. In the meantime, during that transition period, the old FILA will apply.

Senator Olson, I am pleased that you supported the bill. If you had not supported the bill, I can hardly imagine what you might have said. You could have blown me right through that wall. However, in view of the fact that you were so conciliatory about the bill, I was delighted. I know Senator Olson felt that there were a few weaknesses. "Damned with faint praise," I think is the expression that we use.

In any event, I must point out to you, sir, that I did not blame all of the farm problems on the high interest rates. I said that high interest rates were one of the factors. I think if you look again you will see that I did indeed mention low commodity prices and increased farm input costs as also being at the root of the problem as well as the international subsidy war which has affected us in that regard.

● (1910)

You ask what we have done or what this government has done or what governments have done, and maybe it is better to say, "What have governments done to assist in farm credit, particularly in recent times?" I do not want to try to recall to your memory all the things you already know, but one of them is they have reduced the farm credit interest rates under the FCC. The establishment of these committees throughout the country is assisting farmers who are in desperate condition not only with their own confrères, who are farmers and helpful, but also with professional help.

We must mention the $1 billion special grains assistance. We must mention the draining of the Western Grain Stabilization Fund. Obviously, they will have to dip into general revenues if further money is required. We must mention the Advance Grain and Commodities Program, and there are several others.

One correction that must be made, and I bring it to your attention, is the 1/2 of 1 per cent front-end fee. That percentage of 1/2 of 1 per cent is the average between the years 1935 and, I believe, 1984. That charge, Senator Olson, is a one-time charge only and would not apply for reapplication or reinstitution of the loan at a later date.

Those are the main comments I would like to make. I do want to thank both gentlemen for their cogent observations, which always are interesting and always have application to our problems here.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I moved that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

FORGIVENESS OF CERTAIN OFFICIAL DEVELOPMENT ASSISTANCE DEBTS BILL

FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-62, relating to the forgiveness incurred or assumed in respect of certain official development assistance loans made by the Government of Canada to the Governments of Togo and of the Islamic Republic of Mauritania and also to the former East African Community.

Bill read first time.

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate, now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: I would like to ask a question. What is the urgency about this bill?

Senator Doody: The urgency of the bill is that it has been around for some time, and the government is anxious to get the matter cleared up and cleared off the books. As the Honourable Senator Sinclair knows, an attempt was made some time ago to introduce this bill here in this chamber to try to move it along. Unfortunately, that was not proper.

It was subsequently entered into the Order Paper of the House of Commons and has passed that place. It has now reached us. It has been pre-studied, as I understand it, by the Foreign Affairs Committee of this place, and it would seem sensible to try to move it along and to pass it now so that we can dispense with it. I see no purpose in holding it any longer.

Senator Sinclair: Thank you.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), it is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator Rossiter, that this bill be read the second time now. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Explain.

Hon. Eileen Rossiter: Honourable senators, I am most encouraged that the members of the Senate have chosen to consider this legislation without further delay. The matter is urgent and pressing, and I thank you for your cooperation in bringing it before the Senate for discussion at this time.

What the bill before you proposes is to forgive debts incurred through certain official development assistance loans made by the Government of Canada to the Governments of Togo and Mauritania and also to the former East African Community.

There are two vital issues at stake here: shattered African economies and Canada's international reputation. Let me elaborate a little on both of these.

In the mid-sixties, when development assistance on a widespread international scale really began, the poor countries of the Third World were only too happy to borrow what the rich countries were willing to lend. Both lenders and borrowers were optimistic—perhaps naively so—that these loans would quickly rescue the borrowers from their economic woes, and that repayment would be no problem. But no one could foresee what lay ahead—the decline in prices paid for many Third World exports, for instance, and the drastic rise in the price of oil—and many developing countries found they had to keep borrowing more and more money just to stay afloat.

By the mid-1970s it was obvious that many of the borrowers had become far too poor to repay the money already borrowed from Canada and other industrialized nations. By attempting to make these payments, they were, in fact, sinking further and further into debt, requiring more loans, and perpetuating a vicious circle of economic dependence.

In 1977, in the context of the North-South dialogue of that period, Parliament agreed to forgive the aid-related debts to Canada of 12 countries on the United Nations list of the world's least-developed. In December of the same year debt-forgiveness to these dozen nations was enacted into legislation by the Canadian Parliament. Our initiative was applauded internationally as being not only enlightened but being ultimately practical. Canada was one of the first officially to recognize the debt problems of the poorest countries and do something positive about it. That was a decade ago, and I congratulate the current Leader of the Opposition in the Senate, the Honourable Allan MacEachen, for his statesmanship and leadership in this matter.

We have continued to be a world leader on the issue of the Third World debt. In February 1986 the Right Honourable Joe Clark announced that Canada's Official Development Assistance would no longer take the form of loans. From that point on, our Official Development Assistance has been provided on an all-grant basis. This means, in effect, that developing countries, in receiving Canadian aid, will not go further into debt with Canada, because any money allotted for official development assistance will be in the form of a grant and, as such, not subject to repayment. Mr. Clark described this decision as "a tangible step toward offering more effective aid to the Third World."

But more needed to be done. The countries of sub-Saharan Africa, in particular, were facing a human and financial crisis of appalling proportions. Not only had they amassed huge foreign debts but the desert was eating up their farmland, crops had failed for several years in a row, and millions of people were starving. What few resources they had needed to be spent on food, seed and agricultural improvements, not repaying existing loans. So at the United Nations in May of 1986, Canada announced a five-year moratorium on debts incurred by the sub-Saharan African states. Under this moratorium, the sub-Saharan countries need not make any payments to Canada for five years. Indeed, if their economies had not appreciably improved, they could put off repayment for a further five years, and so on, up to the year 2000, if necessary.

● (1920)

This was hailed as a generous and humanitarian move by the entire international community, and particularly by the nations of Africa. It is a decision that has enhanced the reputation Canada enjoys as a world leader in concern for the ravaged economies of the African continent. It is in this spirit that I ask you to consider the bill you have before you today.

In a way, this bill is a hold-over from 1977, when Canada officially forgave the debts of the countries then on the United Nations list of the least developed. Since that time, two other African countries, Togo and the Islamic Republic of Mauritania, have experienced economic troubles so serious that they, too, have been defined by the United Nations as least developed. The Government of Canada feels that to be consistent in our policy toward all such countries, we need to forgive the aid-related debt of these two financially strapped nations. In addition, we should also cancel the remaining debt of the now defunct East African Community, which consisted of three countries, two of which—Tanzania and Uganda—are on the least-developed list.

Our position with regard to Togo is especially critical, since, in 1982, Canada indicated its willingness to forgive the ODA debt incurred by that country. To have dragged our feet this long is bad enough, but to renege on our promise would seriously undermine the high degree of confidence the African nations have in us.

I hope, therefore, that you will give urgent consideration to the passing of this bill.

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have a question I would like to ask before you deal with it. Would you tell us how much money is involved in each of these instances?

Senator Rossiter: In Togo and Mauritania, the total is $20.8 million. The amount for the East African Community—this amount is divided between Kenya, Uganda and Tanzania—is $47.4 million, for a total of $68.2 million.

Senator Sinclair: Thank you.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, Senator Rossiter has dealt quite fully with the reasons behind Bill C-62. She rightly pointed out that this arises from an initiative taken by Canada at the Conference of International Economic Co-operation in 1977—under the leadership of our Opposition Leader in the Senate, as he now is, the Honourable Allan MacEac-hen—when Canada announced that loans to the LDC—least developed countries—as defined by the United Nations, would be forgiven by Canada. She explained the reasons as to why, in addition to this initial group whose loans were forgiven some decade ago, the five countries whose loans are before us this evening should now be forgiven and placed in the same category.

It is interesting to me to know that when the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs undertook its study and reported on the debt problems of Third World countries, we noted and commended the policies of the Government of Canada in relation to the forgiveness of these loans to the really hard-up African countries, the least developed countries. I should point out now that in addition to that, the United Nations has added another category of countries, the LLDCs, the least less developed countries, whose incomes are less than $200-U.S. per annum per capita; the LDCs are countries where the incomes are under $400-U.S. per capita per year. So this is an action which I think should appeal to the responsible instincts of every honourable senator in this house.

In the report of the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs we expressed the hope that other countries would follow the lead given by Canada—and some have done so. I hope that with this additional effort on the part of our country, still other of the developed countries, and the countries of the EEC particularly, would follow Canada's lead. I do not think I need say very much more, because Senator Rossiter covered the reasoning behind the forgiveness of the debt of each of the five countries mentioned in this bill.

The bill has been pre-studied by the Standing Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs within the last week or so, which reported back to the house with a favourable recommendation. I agree with Senator Rossiter's recommendation that we should pass it with dispatch this evening, and I see no reason why it should be referred to a committee again.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

HAZARDOUS PRODUCTS ACT AND OTHER STATUTES

BILL TO AMEND—FIRST READING

The Hon. the Speaker informed the Senate that a message had been received from the House of Commons with Bill C-70, to amend the Hazardous Products Act and the Canada Labour Code, to enact the Hazardous Materials Information Review Act and to amend other Acts in relation thereto.

Bill read first time.

● (1930)

SECOND READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the second time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(f), I move that the bill be read the second time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Brenda M. Robertson: Honourable senators, this bill is a good news bill, and I am pleased to be able to make a few comments concerning the Workplace Hazardous Materials Information System, WHMIS. The primary purpose of WHMIS is to protect Canadian workers by disclosing information about hazardous substances. This kind of information is often not available to workers and employers at the moment, but it is something all Canadians working with hazardous materials have a right to know.

Before I describe WHMIS to this chamber, let me tell you briefly about the process of consultation and consensus developed by organized labour and the federal, provincial and territorial governments that produced this legislation.

The Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Chemical Producers' Association and the Canadian Manufacturers' Association were also keen non-government parties to the WHMIS consensus.

Honourable senators, the cooperation that went into designing WHMIS and the strong and enthusiastic support for WHMIS among all consulting parties are unprecedented. The program is unique because all participants, each representing a different interest, fully support the proposal.

As for WHMIS itself, honourable senators, the programs and national information standards are designed to protect Canadian workers by providing workers and employers with vital information about hazardous chemicals used in the workplace.

To be effective, a workplace hazardous materials information system must be comprehensive. It must be applied consistently in workplaces across Canada. It would make little sense to require hazardous product information in one jurisdiction and not in another. This means that a comprehensive WHMIS program requires the cooperation of federal, provincial and territorial jurisdictions. These jurisdictions all have existing occupational safety and health programs. WHMIS would work through these safety instruments to implement uniformly a national program in all 13 Canadian jurisdictions.

Even though WHMIS is essentially an occupational safety and health initiative, honourable senators, the governments, business and labour agree that the present federal Hazardous Products Act is the best existing statute in which to establish the core requirements for WHMIS, that is, because WHMIS will deal with standards and disclosure requirements for hazardous products at the point of sale or importation.

The bill would deliver the federal portion of WHMIS and would enable the program to be efficiently implemented through the existing occupational safety and health programs of the jurisdictions concerned. This will help avoid needless duplication, make for smoother administration, and enable WHMIS to be a leaner, more efficient program.

Altogether the bill contains modifications to the Hazardous Products Act and to Part IV of the Canada Labour Code. It would also establish new provisions to protect legitimate confidential business information.

The Hazardous Products Act amendments, honourable senators, will serve as a national regulatory foundation for WHMIS. WHMIS will identify the hazardous materials and require information about them in the workplace. It will set up a cautionary labelling system for containers of hazardous materials and require the disclosure of even more information through material safety data sheets, including the identity of hazardous ingredients. It will also establish a maximum fine for an indictable offence of $1 million for violations of the Hazardous Products Act and increase the fine on summary conviction from $1,000 to a maximum of $100,000.

It will also set up a mechanism to protect sensitive, confidential business information, and require the suppliers to provide information, in confidence, to treating medical professionals during emergencies.

The bill also provides for consultation with the provinces, with the territories, with industry and with labour prior to changes in the WHMIS regulations or schedules and the revised Hazardous Products Act.

Honourable senators, amendments to the Canada Labour Code, Part IV, are an important part of the WHMIS legislation. These will extend the protection of the WHMIS proprietary information mechanism to federally regulated employers. All other authorities to implement WHMIS, including requirements for worker education programs, are currently contained in the Canada Labour Code, Part IV.

The goal of WHMIS, honourable senators, is to protect workers, and worker education programs constitute an important part of the system. Under occupational safety and health legislation, the program will require employers to establish education and training programs for employees exposed to workplace hazardous materials. These programs will ensure that employees have the information they need to handle hazardous materials safely.

Honourable senators, in arriving at a workable WHMIS program, the government had to be very sensitive to the need to balance Canadian workers' legitimate right to know about the hazards of products they handle with industry's need to protect confidential business information. Attaining this delicate balance is a fundamental consideration of WHMIS.

The bill therefore includes a mechanism to determine if a supplier should be allowed an exemption to the WHMIS ingredient disclosure requirements on the grounds that such disclosure would cause economic harm.

During consultation all parties agreed on the best mechanism to deal with claims. The mechanism would screen initial claims, adjudicate appeals against screening decisions, and provide a method of judicial review limited to points of law. The bill would create the Hazardous Materials Information Review Commission. It would be a single, national, independent agency able to screen trade secrets and to hear appeals. Trade secrets claims will be ruled on initially by a screening officer of the commission. The affected parties—the manufacturers, the importers and the employees—would have the right to appeal screening decisions to a tripartite appeal panel comprising members nominated by industry, labour and provincial governments.

The commission would be governed by a multipartite council of governors and would report to Parliament through the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I would advise that there is a maximum of 17 members on this council of governors, 13 from the various jurisdictions, two from industry and two from labour.

The commission would be self-financed by fees charged to claimants and appellants.

To guarantee that proprietary information provisions will not conflict with the requirements for worker safety in cases of medical emergencies, provision has been made for the release, in confidence, of necessary information to medical professionals.

WHMIS will get information on hazardous products out where it will do the most good and avoid the problems and significant costs Canadian industry would face if each occupational safety and health jurisdiction tackled the matter on its own.

WHMIS will also reduce the many fatalities and injuries that Canadian workers suffer every year—fatalities and injuries that result in years of lost productive time and billions of dollars' worth of direct and indirect costs to the Canadian economy.

WHMIS is the best kind of regulation. It will provide information so that workers can protect themselves. Instead of proposing detailed requirements that attempt to control every aspect of the problem, it uses a performance-type approach that allows business some flexibility in how to meet regulatory requirements.

The program, honourable senators, places the onus for providing information where it belongs, that is, on the suppliers and importers. These are the people who have the information or who can obtain it at the least cost. In terms of regulatory reform, WHMIS is well designed.

I began my remarks by speaking of the very broad consensus that produced the WHMIS bill, a consensus of industry and labour and of provincial, territorial and the federal government, including the Official Opposition and the NDP members in the House of Commons. WHMIS is a national program with national backing at every level of Canadian society.

I might add, honourable senators, that in the last year representatives of industry and labour have, hand in hand, approached every minister responsible for the regulation of the occupational health and safety standards in Canada, asking to be regulated in accordance with this piece of legislation as rapidly as possible, and they received unanimous support.

The bill will come into force no later than October 31, 1988.

WHMIS consists of a criteria-driven system and has four basic points: one, labelling; two, materials safety data sheets; three, worker education programs; and, four, a trade secret review mechanism.

Honourable senators, this program is long overdue. I certainly hope that the Senate will pass this legislation without too much dissent. I understand that the opposition wishes to have more good news about this legislation, so, the minister is available, at your convenience, to appear before a Committee of the Whole. I will try to answer any questions they may have about the bill. As I have said, if I cannot do so, the minister is available.

● (1940)

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, I have a question right off the bat, which may reveal my own ignorance, but, if I do not reveal it, I will never have it cured. The mover of the motion referred several times to a word which sounds like "WHMIS", which I have never heard before. I went through the bill and I could not see any reference to it there. Would she please explain it to me?

Senator Robertson: Yes, honourable senators, I would be glad to. I had trouble with that myself. Every time one comes across one of those acronyms, it presents difficulties—at least, that is the case for me, being a little tongue-tied. WHMIS is the acronym for Workplace Hazardous Materials Information System. It is really a substitute for the name of the system that will be incorporated under the act.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, Senator Robertson has covered the waterfront quite effectively on this bill and there is not much more I need to say. I would, however, like to raise four or five small points. First, this is a long awaited piece of legislation. As she pointed out, the bill is the result of widespread consultations held by industry, organized labour, the federal, provincial and territorial governments. I think the minister, whom we may be seeing shortly, described it as a real product of consensus. He did not add that it is an initiative of the previous Liberal government, and I thank him for leaving me the opportunity to underline that fact. It is, indeed, an initiative of the former government that has been carried on by the present one.

We support this legislation—

An Hon. Senator: What did he say?

Senator Frith: This is an initiative of the previous Liberal government that has been carried on by the present government.

Senator Doody: They need good news so badly!

Senator Frith: May I proceed? We support this legislation, but we regret that it took so long for the government to complete the initiative. I daresay that the government is also sorry it took so long. The initiative began some four years ago.

As was pointed out, it is going to establish what Senator Hicks and the rest of us have just learned is to be the Workplace Hazardous Materials Information System—what we end up with is WHMIS. I will try to remember how to pronounce that, because I know of a very small village just west of Perth called Wemyss, where several of my relatives, members of the Cameron clan, live. At any rate, WHMIS we will call it, and everyone will know what we are talking about—not the small village west of Perth.

The purpose of this legislation is to protect Canadian workers by disclosing information about hazardous substances used in the workplace. How will this be done? This system will transfer information about hazardous materials from producers, suppliers and importers to employers and, in turn, to employees who use those materials in the workplace. The result is a uniform national system achieved by consensus, and that requires the cooperation of all federal, provincial and territorial governments.

I have a couple of reservations about this legislation; one of them is that we have not had the assurance that the various necessary jurisdictions—namely, the federal, provincial and territorial governments—will have the necessary resources to enforce the legislation. But we can ask the minister about that. We can hope that the necessary resources will be made available at an early date, or that they may already be in place. We do not know exactly what the mechanics of that will be, but the minister may be able to tell us.

The legislation is not to come into force until October 31, 1988, as Senator Robertson said, unless proclaimed sooner. That is made clear in clause 58 of the bill. The other place agreed to pass the bill through all its stages in a single day. So we hope that all honourable senators will not make workers wait for over a year for the protection this bill would grant them. I think Senator Robertson would agree that they have waited quite some time already.

Provision has been made in clause 57 of the bill for a review by a parliamentary committee on the expiration of two years after the coming into force of clause 12 of the Hazardous Products Act. Clause 12 outlines the exclusions or restrictions on the applications of the bill about the sale or importation of certain products. What are those products? One example is explosives within the meaning of the Explosives Act. Another is cosmetics, devices, drugs or food within the meaning of the Food and Drugs Act. Another is controlled products within the meaning of the Pest Control Act. Apparently these items will be considered for possible future inclusion in the WHMIS program, after further consultation with the departments and the implicated crown corporations. We can ask the minister about that as well.

An important feature of this bill, as I believe Senator Robertson has emphasized, is uniformity. Let us hope for the uniform application of the legislation by these various agencies, since uniformity is one of the important objectives of the bill, as it was the objective of the previous government.

One added and perhaps predictable footnote, coming from me, has to do with another subclause of clause 12 of the bill; that is, the clause which includes tobacco and tobacco products as items not covered by the disclosure provisions of the bill.

Senator Haidasz: Shame!

Senator Frith: There will be no requirement for suppliers to list the ingredients of these products. One might understand why the government decided to exempt tobacco products in a bill dealing with workplace hazards because of other legislation seeking the same objective. It is, nevertheless, true that these are dangerous products when used as intended. I can only hope that one day we will see legislation before us—we have already had some from our colleague, Senator Haidasz—requiring manufacturers to list all ingredients found in cigarettes and so to inform people of the numerous toxic chemicals that are regularly found in tobacco products.

Honourable senators, that is all I have to say on the subject of this bill. I don't imagine we will have to detain the minister long, but I have a couple of questions for him and other senators might have some as well. I think it is advisable when dealing with a bill of this kind at this late stage to resolve ourselves into a Committee of the Whole for further study.

Motion agreed to and bill read second time.

REFERRED TO COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this bill be read the third time?

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I move that the bill be referred to Committee of the Whole, and that the Senate do now resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole for that purpose.

The Hon. the Speaker: It is moved by the Honourable Senator Doody, seconded by the Honourable Senator MacDonald (Halifax), that this bill be referred to Committee of the Whole.

Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

The Senate was accordingly adjourned during pleasure and put into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, the Honourable Jean-Maurice Simard in the Chair.

[Translation]

Senator Murray: Mr. Chairman, with your leave, I will now go and get the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Honourable Harvie Andre, who is waiting outside the Senate Chamber.

● (1950)

[English]

Honourable senators, I want to welcome to the Committee of the Whole Senate for the first time the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the Honourable Harvie Andre. Mr. Andre has been a member of the House of Commons since 1972 for the constituency of Calgary Centre, and since 1984 has successively and successfully held the portfolios of Minister of Supply and Services, Associate Minister of National Defence and, for the past year, Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. He is accompanied by Mr. Morris Rosenberg, General Counsel in the department, and Dr. André Lachance, Director, Product Safety Branch, Bureau of Consumer Affairs, in the department.

As usual, I presume that if the minister wishes to refer particular questions to his officials, that would be acceptable. I do not know whether or not the minister has an opening statement, but, in any case, he is here to reply to questions.

The Honourable Harvie Andre, Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs: I am prepared to reply to questions. I do not have an opening statement. I was listening to some of the debate and I believe that senators are aware of the contents of the bill.

Senator Frith: I welcome the minister. I have three or four questions which essentially are for information. The bill has been a legislative concept for some time. It started under the previous government, I believe, and it was continued by your government. It required a good deal of cooperation, because its principle is uniformity among all of the provincial governments and the territorial governments. That consensus has now been obtained.

Since it has taken some time, can you tell us whether the cooperating partners have the resources to enforce the legislation and to put it into operation immediately? Also, are there any cooperative or other mechanisms in place to ensure that they do have the resources to put it into effect?

Mr. Andre: Let me say by way of preamble that you are right, it has been under discussion for a long time—for four years, as a matter of fact. I believe it is the first time in Canadian history that this kind of uniformity and unanimity has taken place among such a diverse group as the CLC, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Chemical Producers, the ten provincial governments, the two territorial governments and the federal government. So it is a unique accomplishment in that regard.

In terms of policing, all jurisdictions—provincial, territorial and the federal government—do have existing occupational safety and health standards covered by legislation that exists on their books. So the additional responsibility, if you will, of policing the provisions of this legislation can quite easily be handled by the inspectors provided for in that legislation. So we do not view that as being a particularly difficult problem.

Senator Frith: My next question arises from clause 58. Can you explain why the bill is not to come into force until October 31, 1988—more than a year from now?

Mr. Andre: That is to allow industry the time required to make all of the accommodations that it is required to make. It has to set up education programs, to prepare all of the material safety data sheets, to do the labelling on the materials—all of which requires a fair amount of time. Indeed, there was some concern that if we were not able to get this legislation through by June of this year, the target of October 1988 could not be met.

There is quite a bit of effort required in the start-up period for industry in particular. We are confident that it is not asking for excessive time; that there is legitimate work to fill all of that intervening time.

Senator Frith: Clause 12 provides that:

This Part does not apply in respect of the sale or importation of any

And it then lists the following:

- (a) explosive within the meaning of the Explosives Act;
- (b) cosmetic, device, drug or food within the meaning of the Food and Drugs Act;
- (c) control product within the meaning of the Pest Control Products Act;
- (d) prescribed substance within the meaning of the Atomic Energy Control Act;
- (e) hazardous waste;
- (f) product, material or substance included in Part II of Schedule I and packaged as a consumer product;
- (g) wood or product made of wood;
- (h) tobacco or product made of tobacco; or
- (i) manufactured article.

I note that the last one is singular. If it were “manufactured articles,” that would cover quite a lot of ground. There are quite a few restrictions on or exemptions from the application of the legislation. Is there a story behind that? Can you explain why? Perhaps you would deal with “(i)” first. What is meant by “manufactured article”? Surely not all manufactured articles—

Mr. Andre: It has to be read in terms of the leading sentence:

This Part does not apply in respect of the sale or importation of any manufactured article. Under the definition clause it says:

“Manufactured article” means any article that is formed to a specific shape or design during manufacture, the intended use of which when in that form is dependent in whole or in part on its shape or design, and that, under normal conditions of use, will not release or otherwise cause a person to be exposed to a controlled product;

Senator Frith: Can you give us an example?

Mr. Andre: For example, let us take a toy. Under the Hazardous Products Act there is the requirement that the paint must be of a quality that should someone chew on it it will not poison him or her. Last Christmas, because of the barium content in a number of toys from the Tonka Company, there was a massive drawback. So there are existing laws which protect the public in terms of manufactured articles that might be made or imported.

Senator Frith: The idea of this essentially is to protect employees.

Mr. Andre: Exactly.

Senator Frith: So, if it is covered in other legislation, they are still protected, because they are members of the public; is that the idea?

Mr. Andre: That's right.

Senator Frith: Is that the rationale behind all of these exemptions, namely, that they are otherwise covered, and employees and members of the public are otherwise protected?

Mr. Andre: In part, senator, but not totally. Each of those acts does have within it the provision to protect those who might use it, and so on; but it is the intent to bring those within this ambit over the course of the next two, three or four years. It took four years to accomplish the consensus in terms of the products that are now included, and to have tried to accomplish each one of these at this stage would, in the view of officials who were working with it, have simply delayed introduction of this legislation for another year or two. So, part of the legislative review is, in fact, an examination to see how much progress has been made in bringing all of these materials within the ambit of this act.

Senator Frith: "Tobacco or product made of tobacco": Is that because of other legislation?

Mr. Andre: That's right.

Senator Frith: What is the rationale for "wood or product made of wood"? Would employees who were not protected from that be covered by something else?

● (2000)

I can appreciate that in some cases it may be just negotiating problems. Can you tell us the reason behind that measure?

Mr. Andre: In wood or wood products, it is a question of familiarity, because you are dealing with furniture, such as chairs, two-by-fours, and so on. That category simply does not apply to hazardous products in the same sense as chemicals.

Senator Frith: With regard to hazardous waste, are people otherwise protected?

Mr. Andre: Yes, it is dealt with in environmental legislation.

Senator Frith: Sufficiently to protect employees?

Mr. Andre: Yes.

[Mr. Andre.]

Senator Frith: And is it the same with regard to atomic energy control?

Mr. Andre: Yes. The Atomic Energy Control Board has the mandate to ensure that radiation levels, and so on, in any workplace are below acceptable limits. In any case, that is one of the substances, if you wish, on which efforts will be made to include it in due course.

Senator Frith: With regard to pest control products, are employees protected under other legislation?

Mr. Andre: Yes. The Departments of Health and Welfare and Agriculture have pretty stringent control systems in place now. Again, it is the intent to include this area in the future.

Senator Frith: And are explosives and food and drug chemicals covered otherwise?

Mr. Andre: It is the same situation, yes.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): Upon reviewing clauses 12 and 57 I realized that within two years clause 12 would be subject to review by a parliamentary committee of the House of Commons and the Senate. I found with interest that we are talking about a rather disciplined and rather well organized milieu, which is the industrial use of hazardous products. Some of us think that pest control products are very dangerous substances and that they are being utilized without a great deal of training and expertise on the part of people, who merely go to the local Co-op or hardware store, buy the product, and spray it around. I wonder whether or not more urgency should have been attached to the Pest Control Products Act than even Agriculture Canada seems to attach to it.

Mr. Andre: I am not sure that I am qualified to comment on the adequacy of the tests, conditions, and so on, that Agriculture Canada imposes upon importers or manufacturers of pest control chemicals. Certainly it is our view, or the view of the drafters here, that the more urgent problem—because heretofore there really has not been adequate protection for workers in the workplace dealing with dangerous chemicals, and some of the statistics about lost time, and so on, are quite amazing—is addressing the particular situation where you have workers dealing with dangerous chemicals, not knowing what they are, and the high rate of lost time due to accidents. The larger problem of chemical use after it leaves the factory, whether it be by farmers, hobby gardeners or whomever, as applied to pest control chemicals, is really beyond the scope of the work that was undertaken to develop this legislation.

Senator LeBlanc (Beauséjour): I can understand that participants, the trade unions and others would not have had this measure as a high priority, but I find it difficult to understand why a department such as the minister's would not have considered whether or not consumer protection should be enhanced.

Mr. Andre: Ironically, from strictly a consumer's point of view, we have been getting complaints that the checks, tests and safety mechanisms Agriculture Canada has in place preclude the entry into the marketplace of competitive chemicals and, as a result, the price of these agricultural chemicals in particular are rather high. The view of some, as a result of the fairly rigorous tests Agriculture Canada has in place, is that it makes it very expensive for competitors to enter the marketplace. So, there is that balance. In any case, I should go back to my first remark and say again that when talking about the Agriculture approved programs we are getting into an area that is really beyond my expertise.

Senator Haidasz: With regard to clause 12, would the minister expound on whether the word "sale" also includes the manufacture of and exportation of?

Mr. Andre: No, it does not.

Senator Haidasz: In other words, some hazardous products can be manufactured, but not exported.

Mr. Andre: I am informed, for example, in terms of manufactured explosives, that that area currently falls within provincial jurisdiction, the normal Occupational Safety and Health, or so-called OSH, regulations.

Senator Haidasz: With regard to subclause 12(h), it has been reported by the press that the organization calling themselves Physicians for a Smoke Free Canada has filed an application with your department to declare tobacco and tobacco products hazardous under the Hazardous Products Act. Has the minister replied to that application in any way?

Mr. Andre: The press story was inaccurate in the sense that there is no automatic trigger for an investigation as to applicability within the Hazardous Products Act. In fact, that particular group filed a statement of claim before the Federal Court claiming that by not responding to their request for an investigation we were not fulfilling our duty. A motion to strike that statement will be laid before the court soon. However, the real answer to the physicians was and remains that my colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Honourable Jake Epp, has brought in a total package dealing with tobacco use, and that it would have been redundant for our department to be using this legislation for the same purpose.

Senator Haidasz: I presume the minister is referring to Bill C-51.

Mr. Andre: I believe that that is the number.

Senator Haidasz: But nowhere in that bill is it stated that tobacco is a hazardous product.

Mr. Andre: No, but the object of the bill is to make it less attractive for people to use tobacco or tobacco products. The mere statement of tobacco being a hazardous product, injurious to health, and so on, is found on the package. So the Hazardous Products Act really deals with labelling, and I think the label is there now.

● (2010)

Senator Sinclair: Mr. Minister, who determines whether an alleged offence will be prosecuted by way of information or indictment?

Mr. Andre: I will ask legal counsel to advise me. I am told that the Attorney General would make that determination.

Senator Sinclair: The Attorney General of any province?

Mr. Andre: Yes, the Attorney General of any province, or the Attorney General at the federal level, if it is within that jurisdiction.

Senator Sinclair: Whether it is by way of information or indictment, why is there not a full delineation of the charge?

Mr. Andre: I am not sure what you mean, senator?

Senator Sinclair: What I have in mind is that statutory defences are not delineated.

Mr. Andre: I am afraid neither I nor counsel is quite sure of what you mean, senator.

Senator Sinclair: There are certain exceptions provided to an alleged offence, but under this statute there is a reverse onus. Why is that?

Mr. Morris Rosenberg, Legal Counsel: Senator, are you referring to clause 29, subclause (2)?

Senator Sinclair: I am afraid I do not know what the clause is. You are more familiar with the bill than I am since I saw it for the first time tonight. Unfortunately, that is one of the difficulties of being a senator. You have these bills thrown at you at the last moment while you, as counsel, have spent years, perhaps, reviewing them.

Senator Murray: It was ever thus.

Senator Sinclair: That does not make it any better, senator.

Mr. Rosenberg: Senator, I think you are referring to clause 29, subclause (2), which says:

In any prosecution for an offence mentioned in subsection (1), the burden of proving that an exception, exemption, excuse or qualification prescribed by law operates in favour of the accused is on the accused and the prosecutor is not required, except by way of rebuttal, to prove that the exception, exemption, excuse or qualification does not operate in favour of the accused . . .

Senator, that is a provision that is found in many federal statutes. I think it simply recognizes the fact that it is often impossible for the prosecutor to know what is in the mind of the accused with respect to the existence of any particular exception or exemption. It is for the accused to bring that before the court.

Senator Sinclair: Are you saying that a general charge is all that is needed?

Mr. Rosenberg: Yes.

Senator Sinclair: Are you saying that that is normal, something that can result in an indictment, putting a chief executive officer in jail for six months?

Mr. Rosenberg: I believe so, senator. The charge would have enough particularity to allow the company, the CEO or the individual to know what matter he is charged with so that he can answer the charge as a matter of general law.

Senator Sinclair: Have you had motions for greater particularity?

Mr. Rosenberg: I beg your pardon, senator?

Senator Sinclair: When charges of this kind have been laid, have you had motions for greater particularity in the indictment?

Mr. Rosenberg: Senator, there can be motions for greater particularity, yes, and if the charge is vague enough, it can be dismissed by the court. Presumably the charge will be framed in such a way as to allow the accused to know the matter with which he is charged, and to make a full answer to the charge.

Senator Sinclair: Mr. Minister, in dealing with the various consultations that took place, was there any question raised with you by corporations as to this matter?

Mr. Andre: No, there was not any raised with me. However, the consultations were pretty intense, and there were senior people from the Canadian Chemical Producers' Association and the Canadian Manufacturers Association involved at every step of the way. By the time we finally closed this final package, I can assure you that there had been many phone calls over a "the" and a "but", and so on, in an attempt to have wording in the bill that was acceptable to all parties.

Senator Robertson: Mr. Minister, I have no question. I just wanted to come back to something that Senator LeBlanc mentioned to you relative to the Pest Control Products Act, which I know is not currently within your ambit, in that there are difficulties because there is a broad interpretation of the application. However, I do not want to lose this opportunity of mentioning to you, sir, that that registration division of the Department of Agriculture comes under a great deal of fire. There is a lot of difficulty in getting information about the products that are registered there, and there is a feeling amongst a number of governments and other people that that registration process should not go on in the user department; it should go on in the control department, such as your own and the Department of the Environment. Mr. Minister, I want to tell you that there are a great many problems there, and I hope you will look at that matter very soon.

Mr. Andre: Senator, we are aware of those concerns and we are attempting to address them, because, as I indicated earlier in more detail, there are all kinds of difficulties and a genuine feeling on the part of many—and one which I would not dispute—that the consumer may well be paying more than is necessary because of the regulatory structure we have in place, which makes it very difficult for competitors to come on to the market.

Senator Robertson: I apologize, Mr. Minister, for not having sufficient information about the product abused.

Senator Haidasz: Mr. Minister, as hazardous products may have deleterious effects upon the health of people, is there anything in this bill which would force the manufacturer to disclose all ingredients of a hazardous product for the information of a physician treating an injured worker?

[Mr. Rosenberg.]

Mr. Andre: Yes, very definitely. That is specifically provided for in the bill, that the information must be made available by the employer to the physician. There is a second level of information that the supplier must also make available. Therefore, it is specifically stated in the bill that physicians will have the necessary information to treat anyone who may be injured as a result of contact with a dangerous material.

Senator Haidasz: If so, how is the patentholder of a product protected as far as it relates to disclosure of all the ingredients in a product?

Mr. Andre: Senator, that comes under the trade secrets protection mechanism. If the patentholder feels that certain chemicals or materials cannot be disclosed for trade secret purposes, he must convince a commission to that effect. In turn, the commission's decision is appealable to an appeals structure composed of representatives from labour, government and the manufacturers' association.

The trickiest part of this whole operation was putting in place that trade secrets mechanism. We now have a mechanism that labour is satisfied will look after their interests, and business is satisfied will be able to protect their trade secrets.

However, the information with respect to the chemical will be made available to the physician in the event that it is required for the treatment of someone who has been injured.

Senator Frith: In spite of the trade secret?

Mr. Andre: In spite of the trade secret.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, since there are no more senators who intend to put questions to the minister, I would now like to thank the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs for having agreed to this exercise. I am sure that your answers will give us a better appreciation and understanding of Bill C-70. Thank you sir, and thank you, honourable senators.

Honourable senators, would you have me call clause by clause or, since we have had quite a few discussions on a number of clauses—

[English]

Honourable senators, is it your intention that I call the bill clause by clause?

Hon. Senators: No.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, is it your wish that I report the bill without amendment?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

● (2020)

Senator Frith: Mr. Chairman, I believe we have to carry the clauses and the title of the bill. However, we do not have to do that clause by clause.

[Translation]

The Chairman: Are clauses 1 to 58 to be reported as having been adopted?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Chairman: Agreed. Is the title of Bill C-70 agreed to?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

[English]

Senator Doody: I move that the committee rise and report the bill without amendment.

The Chairman: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, the sitting of the Senate is resumed.

[Translation]

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Hon. Jean-Maurice Simard: Honourable senators, the Committee of the Whole to which was referred Bill C-70, to amend the Hazardous Products Act and the Canada Labour Code, to enact the Hazardous Materials Information Review Act and to amend other Acts in relation thereto, has examined the bill and asked me to report the bill without amendment.

THIRD READING

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall the bill be read the third time?

[English]

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(b), I move that the bill be read the third time now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and bill read third time and passed.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FURTHER DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Leave having been given to revert to Question Period:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, as I mentioned earlier today, I have six further delayed answers, and I ask that they be taken as read.

Hon. Royce Frith: Do you have subject matters?

Senator Doody: On May 27, 1987, there was a question by the Honourable Philippe Deane Gigantès, regarding Senate Reform—Appointments—Submission of Names to Prime Minister.

On the same date there was a question by the Honourable Jerahmiel S. Grafstein, regarding First Ministers' Accord—Funding for Cultural Institutions—Ability of Quebec to Opt Out.

On June 11, 1987, there was a question by the Honourable Joseph-Philippe Guay, regarding Transport—Winnipeg International Airport—Public Parking.

On June 22, 1987, there was a question by the Honourable Dan Hays, regarding Agriculture—Special Grains Program—Request for Expediting of Payments.

On the same date there was a question by the Honourable John B. Stewart, regarding Agriculture—Special Grains Program—Request for Expediting of Payments.

On June 29, 1987, there was a question by the Honourable H.A. Olson and the Honourable Hazen Argue regarding relocation of CN offices to Montreal.

I can read any or all of the answers senators may wish; otherwise, I ask that they be printed as part of today's proceedings.

Senator Frith: Agreed.

SENATE REFORM

APPOINTMENTS—SUBMISSION OF NAMES TO PRIME MINISTER

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on May 27, 1987, by the Honourable Philippe Deane Gigantès, suggesting that a province may wish to elect its list of Senate nominees.

(The answer follows:)

The Constitutional Accord of June 3, 1987 ensures that Senate reform will be given the highest priority at annual First Ministers' Conferences on the Constitution. Until further Senate reform is achieved, it has been agreed that the Government of Canada will appoint Senators from among persons whose names are submitted by the government of the province to which the vacancy relates.

The specific question of electing the provincial Senate nominees is hypothetical, as it has not yet been raised by the government of any province. It is to be noted that the Accord provides for the participation of both levels of government in the selection process, in that names of persons must first be submitted by the provincial government, whereupon the Government of Canada appoints a Senator acceptable to it from among those names.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD—FUNDING FOR CULTURAL INSTITUTIONS—ABILITY OF QUEBEC TO OPT OUT

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on May 27, 1987, by the Honourable Jeremiah S. Grafstein, regarding funding for cultural institutions and the ability of Quebec to opt out under the provisions of the constitutional agreement.

(The answer follows:)

The spending power provision of the Constitutional Accord of June 3, 1987 is limited to new national shared-cost programs in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. It accordingly has no application to cultural institutions that are funded exclusively by the Government of Canada, and the issue of compensating a non-participating province is not germane.

TRANSPORT

WINNIPEG INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT—PUBLIC PARKING

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on June 11, 1987, by the Honourable Joseph-Philippe Guay, regarding Transport—Winnipeg International Airport—Public Parking.

(The answer follows:)

The number of metered parking spaces available at the airport for use by the general public has not changed. There has, however, been a change in the allocation of these parking spaces, in order to provide a balance of available spaces for the general public as well as for the users of vehicle rentals. Vehicle rentals are used by a large segment of the travelling public and, therefore, the pick-up and drop-off areas for these vehicles must be visible and convenient. The consolidation of the vehicle rental parking spaces thus improves the ground transportation system at the airport by removing an element of confusion for travellers using these vehicles. It also lessens the likelihood of vehicles being parked indiscriminately and blocking the flow of traffic in front of the terminal building and public parking areas. The public parking revenues for the metered areas are $190/metered stall per month with the same number of metered parking spots (176) available today as there was prior to the car rental reallocation. In comparison, the car rental companies generate $678/stall per month in airport revenue.

There is a project under way to realign the street structure at the airport and double the amount of short-term metered parking lots. On completion of the project to realign the street structure, the area where the rental vehicles are now parked will be converted back to meters. The vehicle rental parking will be moved into a new area which will be adjacent to the current vehicle rental parking area. This project is expected to be completed by the summer of 1988.

The metered parking areas as well as the car rental areas of the airport are well marked and proper signage is in place designating each area. In addition to the short-term parking, the airport has a public parking lot that is not used to maximum capacity and is located well within Transport Canada prescribed walking distance of the Air Terminal Building. The long term parking presently does not have excess parking spots available and is not, at this time, a viable option for relocation of the car rental vehicles. There are car rental personnel used to shuttle cars from a service centre to a designated parking stall. There is no available linear curb space in front of the Air Terminal Building for car rental vehicles to be dropped off for customers.

AGRICULTURE

SPECIAL GRAINS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EXPEDITING OF PAYMENTS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on June 22, 1987, by the Honourable John B. Stewart, regarding Agriculture—Special Grains Program—Request for Expediting of Payments.

(The answer follows:)

Below are the dates of major payouts to farmers made under the Appropriation Act approved before the end of March;

$1.3 M was paid on April 17, 1987, covering interim payments under the Special Canadian Grains Program to 2,835 producers.

191,850 cheques for final payment were issued June 11, 1987.

A further 2,749 cheques (11.7 M) were released June 29, 1987.

The remaining cheques will be issued as quickly as possible over the next 4-8 weeks.

SPECIAL GRAINS PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR EXPEDITING OF PAYMENTS

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on June 22, 1987, by the Honourable Daniel Hays, regarding Agriculture—Special Grains Program—Request for Expediting of Payments.

(The answer follows:)

The representations made by Senator Hays have been brought to the attention of the Minister of Agriculture. Senator Hays may be interested in the following update with regard to the Special Canadian Grains Program;

As of June 23, over 190,000 final cheques worth $917.9 million have been issued. This includes an additional 2,749 cheques totalling $11.7 M which were released June 29, 1987.

The balance of payments for unresolved claims, multiple eligibility and additional payments for irrigated acreage in risk areas 1, 2, 3, 5, and 12, in Alberta and 12 and parts of 13 in Saskatchewan are expected to be issued over the next six to eight weeks.

Arrangements have been made to process all outstanding claims as quickly as possible. This includes provisions for overtime if required.

RELOCATION OF EXECUTIVE OFFICES FROM EDMONTON TO MONTREAL

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I have an answer in response to a question raised in the Senate on June 29, 1987, by Senator Olson and Senator Argue, regarding relocation of CN offices to Montreal.

(The answer follows:)

In a press release issued on Sunday, June 28th, the President and Chief Executive Officer of Canadian National, Ron Lawless, said regional offices in Moncton, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, and Edmonton will remain. "Nor will there be relocation of company personnel, including senior executive officers, from the regions to corporate headquarters in Montreal", he said.

"On the contrary, CN will maintain—and in some respects likely enhance—its regional presence, particularly in Western Canada where 70 per cent of our business is generated," he said. "One way to achieve this would be to establish marketing activity closer to our customers," he added.

ENERGY

DOMESTIC PETROLEUM-AMOCO CANADA TRANSACTION—CURRENT SITUATION

Hon. Ian Sinclair: Honourable senators, earlier today a delayed answer was given by the Deputy Leader of the Government. I notice that Senator Murray is now in the chamber. I would like to ask him a question in relation to the delayed answer.

Today is June 30, double doomsday for Dome Petroleum, unless certain actions were taken. Can the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate assist us with any further advice as to the situation in that very important matter of Dome Petroleum?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, has issued a statement today pointing out that in the circumstances to which Senator Sinclair refers, Dome and its creditors will revert to the financing arrangements for Dome that were in place before the Memorandum of Understanding. Mr. Masse reiterates the government's position that the Dome issue should be resolved by the private parties involved within the established framework of government laws and policies.

While the lapsing of the Memorandum of Understanding brings an element of some uncertainty, Mr. Masse underlines the interest of all parties in proceeding responsibly to a satisfactory resolution. The government is monitoring the issues through regular contact with the parties.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, as I recollect the Memorandum of Agreement between Amoco and Dome, there was a further period of 45 days beyond the double doomsday date of June 30. Is the government following that, and are they in contact with any of the parties?

There are literally thousands of people whose employment and continued employment is based on the continuation of Dome Petroleum, and that is the reason I ask the question.

Senator Murray: I appreciate the point made by the honourable senator. The information I have, as the honourable senator knows, is that Dome has not won the approval of its creditors for the proposal of Amoco Canada to purchase the company but that Dome is still pursuing that option. Dome has not concluded new financing arrangements with its creditors.

I do not have information on the further period that is allowed for in the arrangements to which the senator refers.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, I have one further question with regard to this matter. In the delayed answer, the answer provided that in considering what was for the benefit of Canada it was not open to Investment Canada to consider an alternative bid. It was stated that that was beyond their mandate.

While I can understand that answer in part, I would like to ask how you can determine what is for the benefit of Canada if you do not look at the lock-in or lock-out provisions of a bid.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the act provides for consideration by Investment Canada of such matters as Canadian participation, investment, employment, and so forth.

● (2030)

We are aware that other companies had indicated an interest in Dome and that Dome's chairman has underlined his fiduciary responsibility to consider any and all offers made for the company—whether by Amoco or any other company.

Senator Sinclair: I am sorry, but could you assist me by saying whether there is anything in the Investment Canada Act that precludes looking at provisions in a bid that prevents subsequent action by other parties that did not take part in the bidding process in determining what is for the benefit of Canada?

Senator Murray: I am not aware of any such provision that would preclude Investment Canada from looking at that sort of thing. I was chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce, and the honourable senator was a member of it, when the Investment Canada Act went through.

The question really is how far Investment Canada should be authorized to look at all of these factors and how far they should be authorized to go in looking behind a particular takeover proposal that had been accepted by the shareholders of a private company. How far back does the honourable senator think that Investment Canada should go—how many generations, and into what detail?

The act provides that under certain circumstances, Investment Canada would review the takeover of a company that had been approved by the shareholders of that company.

Senator Sinclair: Honourable senators, my question arises because of the terminology of the answer that was given today. The government has not received a copy of the bidding rules. I am not asking about the bids per se—I understand that completely—but the bidding rules certainly must have some effect on what we look at as being for the general benefit of Canada, which I understand is a criterion that must be taken into account by Investment Canada. Otherwise, you could set up bidding rules that were so structured as to preclude something that was for the benefit of Canada.

Senator Murray: Well, honourable senators, I am not sure that a lot of that information is not already in the public domain, frankly.

Senator Sinclair: No, not this. With all due respect—

Senator Murray: Honourable senators have had a further opportunity to discuss the matter in the Energy Committee, and have had the chairman and people from the companies present and have examined them, I gather, in some detail on all of these matters.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

ADJOURNMENT

Leave having been given to revert to Notices of Motions:

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): Honourable senators, I would like to place the adjournment motion, and, following that, we can move directly to Royal Assent, if it is the wish of the Senate. The representative of the Governor General and the representative of the government are both with us and ready to proceed.

Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(g), I move:

That when the Senate adjourns today, it do stand adjourned until Monday next, July 6, 1987, at two o'clock in the afternoon.

Senator Haidasz: Explain!

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, could I ask Senator Doody two questions? First, why Monday rather than the usual Tuesday; and, second, what business will be before us when we come back on the Monday or the Tuesday? What business will the government be presenting to us?

Senator Doody: The answer to the first question, of course, is that it is not a usual week, because it is usual to adjourn at just about the same time as the House of Commons does. To say that next week is a usual week would not be to state the case quite correctly.

As to what work we have to do, we have the Committee of the Whole—that can be carried on with—and I am sure that there are many other items on this order paper that can be dealt with and looked after.

In any event, we have several committees that are anxious to get working on bills which the government is quite anxious to get, and I think that our being here might help to expedite that matter.

Senator Haidasz: Is the House sitting—the other house?

Senator MacEachen: It is nice that you became interested in the Committee of the Whole.

Senator Doody: Touché!

Senator Frith: Especially when you have been totally opposed to it. A bit of Damascus, there!

Senator Doody: I have tried my best to expedite the wishes of the Senate—always.

Senator Frith: Keep it up!

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Am I to understand, Senator Doody, that work on the stairwells will not begin next week and I will not have to move my office? Is that the implication of your motion?

Senator Doody: I am told by the whip that the work on the staircases will not start until the Senate adjourns, so I cannot comment further on the honourable senator's moving plans.

Senator Corbin: It is important that I know, because, in anticipation of the move, I would like to pack up a day ahead of time so as not to delay anyone.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I believe that we are faced with an unusual situation but one that is not unusual for the reasons that the Deputy Leader of the Government has stated.

The situation at the present time is that today and yesterday the Senate passed a large number of bills in an effort to accommodate the wishes of the government. We have waived all the rules for several days in order to facilitate government business. All of the business that the government wished to put before the House of Commons has been dealt with. Now it has come to the Senate, and it has been dealt with by the Senate.

There is a particular situation with respect to Bill C-22 and two transport bills. These bills have been, by order of the Senate, sent to committee after second reading. The committees have met and have established a work program to deal with the references that they have.

While I have only been in the Senate for a relatively short time in comparison with many others, I have observed that committees have had an unusual degree of autonomy in establishing their work programs. I have never observed the Senate itself instructing a committee as to how it should conduct its work program.

[Senator Murray.]

In this particular case the Deputy Leader of the Government has told us that we are to be brought back, so to speak, as a "guard of honour" for the committees, or as "sentinels," to wait in the Senate chamber while the committees are doing their work and while the government is asking us to call for business that has been put on the order paper by the opposition.

An Hon. Senator: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: It is very clear—and I have no intention of opposing the motion—that its acceptance and our return next week will reveal fully the absurdity of the situation—

An Hon. Senator: Right on!

Senator MacEachen: —and the absurdity of the motion that is being put tonight. The government has no more business—

Senator Frith: We have done it all!

Senator MacEachen: —to put before the Senate; we have cooperated 100 per cent in cleaning up all of the government business. It will have no new business to put before us next week, and the business that it has, namely, the three bills I have mentioned, has been sent to two committees. These committees will report in the usual way, and I believe will do their work properly.

● (2040)

We now find ourselves in a rather absurd situation. I believe that we have to come to the conclusion that the Senate will not always be able to complete its work in unison with the House of Commons. That reality flows inexorably from the fact that this is a second chamber, it is a chamber of sober second thought, whose purpose is to examine legislation when the examination in the House of Commons has been completed. That is when we begin our work. It was never intended that the Senate should do its work simultaneously with the House of Commons, because by following such a course of action the Senate would lose its rationale.

I believe that in the case of the three bills which have been referred to committee, all three are very important and that they require further study. I believe the committees will deal with them in that way and will have them ready, certainly for the House of Commons when it returns, or even earlier. It is expected that the House of Commons will adjourn until the Monday following Labour Day, and certainly the Senate will have the legislation available at least on that date or earlier.

I believe that we must come to an understanding that it will not always be possible to complete our work in unison with the House of Commons, and that this conclusion will lead to two consequences that I wish to mention. One consequence is that committees may have to do some work during the summer adjournment; and the second consequence is that the Senate may have to return earlier than the House of Commons in the fall in order to have its legislation completed so that it can be dealt with by the House of Commons.

I find the situation quite healthy, that is, that the Senate is saying that we need to take a little more time; that we will have these bills ready for the House of Commons when it returns.

It may be that someone will question why these bills will not be passed by the end of July or the first week in August. If there is an argument to the effect that it is crucial and urgent to have the transport bills dealt with in mid-August rather than mid-September, then we would listen to that. The same situation would apply if there were a crucial argument as to why something critical hangs on passing the drug patent bill or dealing with it in the Senate by the middle of July or the middle of August rather than the first of September. I have not heard any such arguments, but I do say—and I want to make it clear for the benefit of the government, because I think the government is entitled to be told at least what our intentions are—that, certainly, it is our intention to have these bills available for the House of Commons no later than the return of the House of Commons in the fall, and possibly earlier than that.

Honourable senators, I am making these points because we are faced with a rather bizarre situation, namely, that because the Senate, in its wisdom, has decided to send three bills to committee for study, the government has decided to bring us back as a punishment. It has no other purpose. If the government could tell us, "We have several important bills for you on Monday," of course, it would make sense.

I simply point out these facts, honourable senators, not to oppose the motion but to reveal the absurdity of the situation which the government is promoting by making a motion to bring us back, with no government business for us to deal with.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): There is nothing that so excites honourable senators opposite than the prospect of a holiday delayed.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Frith: We are here and we will be here.

Senator Murray: Senator Hicks tells us that he is as willing to work as we are or as anyone else is, so he will have that opportunity.

Senator Frith: Start again.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the situation we are in is as follows: There are three government bills which the government hoped and expected—and had every reason to hope and expect—would have been disposed of by Parliament before the summer adjournment. These bills have been referred to by the Honourable Leader of the Opposition. They are Bills C-18, C-19 and C-22.

Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition in this place has refused to dispose of them one way or the other.

Senator Frith: Is a motion that they be referred to committee not disposing of a bill any more?

Senator Murray: No, that is not disposing of a bill.

Senator Frith: Rubber stamping?

Senator MacEachen: Perhaps defeating it?

Senator Murray: My honourable friends could have defeated the bill if they had so wished. They have that right.

They make no arrangement as to when the bills might be disposed of beyond saying that it will be, certainly, by Labour Day, if not sooner.

It is the judgment of the government, which has considered this matter today, that the public interest is so engaged in these matters that Parliament ought not to take a summer holiday until the matters are disposed of.

My colleague, the Deputy Prime Minister, the government leader in the other place, tells me that in the circumstances the government will be seeking to have the House of Commons called back into session next week. Those arrangements can be made under the rules of that place. It is his intention to have the House of Commons brought back to await the pleasure of honourable senators opposite on these three bills. I assume, since members of the other place will not wish to be idle, that they will be dealing with government business, of which there is plenty, which might have been undertaken in the fall, but can be dealt with now, so there is no reason to believe that we will be totally idle either.

The fact of the matter is that we will be sitting until those bills are disposed of, one way or another, by the Senate.

I think I should take advantage of this opportunity to say a word or two about the bills in question, not about the substance of the bills but the process that we have followed.

All of these bills have been around for some considerable time.

Senator Frith: In the House of Commons.

Senator Murray: As I said, the public interest is engaged in the delay and the obstruction that has taken place by honourable senators opposite.

The government is seriously concerned, and I can tell honourable senators that that concern is shared by, among many others, the Government of Quebec. This delay is going to cost the country, the Province of Quebec and the private sector investment in research and in the industry in that province and elsewhere. That is one of the reasons why the government wishes to get this bill through before Parliament takes any summer holidays.

With regard to the two transport bills, these, too, have been around for some considerable time. Mr. Crosbie has spoken to me about them. In my travels last week in the maritime provinces, I was, to my considerable astonishment, waited on by a number of people who are in the shipping business, and so forth, who wanted to know what in the name of goodness was going on in the Senate and why the Senate was holding up this legislation and why the Senate could not deal with it. I was not able to enlighten them, except to suggest that they make representations to the opposition members to see whether they could talk some sense into them.

[Senator Murray.]

● (2050)

With regard to Bill C-22, this bill has been in the public domain for over a year. It was introduced in the House of Commons on November 7, 1986, after which 87 hours were spent debating it. After second reading, the bill was sent to the legislative committee in the other place, which heard 96 witnesses representing 46 organizations. The legislative committee held 65 hours of hearings on the bill. Meanwhile, on a number of occasions we on this side proposed to the leadership on the other side that a pre-study of that bill commence. We knew that the bill was politically contentious. On every occasion that we proposed a pre-study—and there was plenty of time available for such a pre-study—our proposal was rejected.

Finally, when the bill received first reading here, it went to a special committee. The Special Committee of the Senate was set up, by the way, with instructions to report by a certain date. It was a bit late, I believe, for reasons that we are aware of. In any case, during its deliberations it had eight meetings in Ottawa, hearing witnesses, and ten meetings on the road. I would estimate that something like 75 hours were spent by the Special Committee, which received 130 briefs.

I do not wish to be controversial at this point, but I do want to say that in my humble opinion the work of that committee did not represent many of the finer hours of the Senate. There was an enormous amount of repetition and time-wasting and an enormous amount of taxpayers' money spent in an exercise which, frankly, has not produced very much.

The committee went around the country and heard witnesses that had appeared before the committee of the other place. The Special Committee heard from the Consumers' Association of Canada in Ottawa and then, in every province to which it travelled, it heard from the provincial branch of that association. The Special Committee heard from the Canadian Labour Congress before it went on the road and then, in every province, it heard from the provincial branch of the Labour Congress. And all of this at a cost of something like $300,000 or $350,000 of a total Senate committee budget that was already badly overspent.

Of course, they could not find time to go to Montreal, where there is some economic interest in this bill and in seeing this bill passed. The committee did, however, get to Quebec City, where it heard from the Government of Quebec, represented by the Minister of Industry and Commerce, surrounded by faculty deans and senior Quebec science authorities. The committee finally got the Montreal Board of Trade to appear before it, as well as the Chambre de Commerce, the Conférence des Maires de Banlieus, and the Montreal Urban Communities Economic Development office.

Honourable senators will be aware that we have had resolutions passed by the National Assembly of Quebec, by the city council of Montreal and by many other bodies seeking to have this bill passed. There is, frankly, no justification in the world—no justification in the world—except mischief and partisan politics on the part of honourable senators opposite for delaying this bill further. I challenge them, if they do not want the bill, to defeat it.

Hon. Len Marchand: Will the honourable senator accept a question?

Senator Murray: I will accept a question when I am finished, but I will repeat that there is no justification in the world, except mischief and partisan politics, for delaying this bill any further.

Let me say a word about the transport bills. As I told honourable senators, I was waited on in my travels in the maritime provinces last week by people who have an interest in the industry and in seeing these bills dealt with. These people are very concerned about the reluctance of honourable senators to dispose of this legislation. These bills are based on a policy paper put out by Mr. Mazankowski when he was the Minister of Transport, which policy paper was called "Freedom to Move". That policy paper itself went to a committee of the other place that held 23 meetings in Ottawa over 39 hours and 31 minutes and seven meetings out of town over an additional 34 hours and 13 minutes, for a total time of 86 hours. There were 196 witnesses that appeared before it. When Bills C-18 and C-19 finally came to the house, the committee held 30 meetings over 77 hours and 20 minutes and 17 meetings out of town for a further 63 hours and 50 minutes to total 143 hours and 40 minutes. Meetings were held in Vancouver, Edmonton, Regina, Winnipeg, St. John's, Halifax, Moncton and Montreal. There were 409 witnesses that appeared.

There again, on numerous occasions during the winter and early spring we proposed to honourable senators opposite that those bills be pre-studied, and on each occasion our proposal was turned down. I think it is quite unreasonable.

Senator MacEachen: In light of the experience we had yesterday, the pre-study will become even more exceptional in the future. Take that as notice.

Senator Murray: That is a threat.

Senator MacEachen: That is not a threat.

Senator Frith: "Take your pre-study, or there is no chance at it"—yours was the threat, sir.

Senator Murray: We used to see how members opposite behaved when they had a majority in the other place, and even when they have a majority in this non-elected place they behave quite irresponsibly. That is what they are doing.

Senator MacEachen: You must have had a hard week in the maritimes!

Senator Murray: I had a very pleasant week in the maritimes, as a matter of fact.

Senator MacEachen: Well, it didn't do much for your temper.

Senator Murray: I am telling honourable senators that in the considered opinion of the government the public interest is at stake with respect to these bills. They are important bills. I concede readily what is obvious, that they are contentious bills, but honourable senators have a choice. They could vote against them. They do not need to prolong ad infinitum these so-called studies—

Senator Frith: So-called studies!

Senator Murray:—particularly in the case of the drug bill. I think that a committee has the duty to hear the various points of view, but every point of view that could possibly have been expressed has been heard, not once but scores of times.

Senator Frith: By another committee!

Senator Murray: No, no, by the Senate committee. When the Special Committee on Bill C-22 accepted a deadline to report, then went out and held all of the meetings to which I have referred, heard all of the witnesses and received all of the briefs to which I have referred, I think it is not unreasonable to expect that honourable senators would then have been in a position to have dealt with the bill after second reading in a more expeditious fashion. Instead, they have decided to prolong the agony—to go on all summer, notwithstanding the representations that are being made to them on all sides, not just by the government but by the private sector, and, if I am informed correctly, by many people in their own party to act responsibly and to deal with the bill.

● (2100)

There is really nothing more that I can say on the matter. Mr. Mazankowski, the President of the Privy Council, proposes under the circumstances to have the House of Commons recalled, because public interest is so engaged in these matters, and to have it recalled next week. In the absence of some acceptable arrangement for dealing with these bills, he feels—and the government agrees—that that is his only option; and we can do no less.

Senator Marchand: Would the Leader of the Government take a question?

Senator Murray: Yes.

Senator Marchand: First, I agree with him that there is considerable public interest in Bill C-22, and I note that when he spoke about provincial support in Quebec, or support by the Quebec government, he did not mention the representations from the other provinces. Perhaps he will tell honourable senators what was the stand taken by the other provinces, such as New Brunswick, Ontario—

Senator Guay: British Columbia.

Senator Marchand: The Province of British Columbia and others. The Leader of the Government should round out the record. I understand and recognize that the Province of Quebec is all for it; but if he will take a look at the poll, the result of which appeared in the Toronto Star, he will understand that the public of Quebec, the majority of the people in the province of Quebec, the consumers, the poor, and the aged are not in favour of Bill C-22, that they are very much opposed to it. We heard from many people across the country, particularly the consumer groups, the aged and the very poor. I would like to see on the record the position of the provinces as it was represented to the government.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I should mention that it was under considerable duress that the committee agreed to hear La Fédération de l'Âge d'Or, which is the largest senior citizens organization in Quebec with 250,000 members, an organization that supports Bill C-22. I am sorry that the chairman of the committee is not present to hear me, because I would have liked to have said this in his presence. His conduct of that committee was not such as to bring much credit on the Senate, on the committee or on himself. The deck was stacked from the beginning, in terms of witnesses. The committee sidestepped Montreal, Calgary and Vancouver, where it might possibly have heard some support for the bill. It brought in organizations not once but twice; it heard from provincial branches of national organizations, and all the rest of it.

Of course there were concerns expressed by provinces and by a great many other people. The concerns were legitimate, were treated as such by the government, and were dealt with by government spokesmen, including the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs who appeared on one occasion before the committee.

When, in what I thought was an act of cooperation with the Senate, the minister decided to send a legislative assistant with the committee, the chairman, Senator Bonnell, in one of the most ignoble and petty and miserable acts I have ever heard of, threw the legislative assistant off the committee's bus and would not allow her to travel with the committee.

This has been an exercise that has brought no credit upon the chairman of the committee, the committee or the Senate. It has been a frightful waste of $350,000 of taxpayers' money. I think the time has come for honourable senators to summon up their courage and to defeat the bill, if that is what they want to do.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, can we start by taking up the theme of "ignoble and petty behaviour"? We have now seen the contempt which the Leader of the Government in the Senate has for the Senate and its committees.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Frith: Let us look at what this transparent performance is based on. First, with regard to these bills, they have "been around" for quite a long time. "Around" means that they have been in the House of Commons. So, do we now have a principle that bills have been "around" Parliament for a long time because they have been in the House of Commons? "This delay is costing money."—

Senator Murray: Costing investment, costing jobs.

Senator Frith: Costing investment—and costing what else?

Senator Murray: Jobs.

Senator Frith: Jobs and investment. Did it cost jobs and investment during the year that it was in the other place, while it was "around" in the other place? It did not cost any jobs and investment then. But all of a sudden, once it gets to the Senate, it is starting to cost jobs and investment—but not when it is in the other place.

Senator Murray: Which bill are you talking about?

Senator Frith: We are talking, I think, about Bills C-18, C-19 and C-22. We have had those bills since May, for Bill C-22; since June 17 for Bill C-18; and June 25 for Bill C-19.

Senator Barootes: It was months ago.

Senator Frith: We have not had those bills for that length of time. I am glad that we are getting a rise out of Senator Barootes. We now find that this just starts to cost money and investment, and the delay starts only when it comes to the Senate. That is what our colleague, Senator Murray, tells his fellow senators. I have never heard him stand in his place and complain about the delay that was taking place when these bills were in the other place. We are always lectured and told, "Why are you delaying this bill?" It is "delay" when it comes here. We hear about "the members opposite." Let us look at Bills C-18 and C-19—the "unjustifiable action" with regard to those bills by the committee wanting to study them; "unjustifiable action by the members opposite."

Well, the decision on Bills C-18 and C-19 was made by a committee—and we know the contempt that Senator Murray has for the committees. We have heard about that today. There were members from his side—not "members from the side opposite"—on that committee and who made the decision, with regard to Bills C-18 and C-19, knowing how big and important they were, to take briefs up to August 1 and to start their work after the first week in September. That decision was made by the committee on which there were members from the government side. In fact, they had a majority when the decision was made. There were only two Liberals and three Conservatives, and the three Conservatives voted for dealing with this bill in the fall. This is the "shameful activity" by which we are delaying this bill.

So the Leader of the Government not only has contempt for the committees but he has complete contempt for all of their members, I take it, including members from his side, who voted in favour of the procedure for Bills C-18 and C-19.

So that takes care of the "delaying action" on those bills. So far as Bill C-22 is concerned, that bill was the subject of pre-study. The committee reported, without recommendations, that it wanted to study it further. The committee's chairman reported that the committee required further study. He asked for the right to retain expert advice to do so, and the motion was put before the Senate. Senator Murray unfortunately was otherwise occupied; but that motion passed, not on division but unanimously, during his absence.

So much for those three bills. That is the kind of contempt that the Leader of the Government, our colleague in the Senate, has for the work of the Senate and its committees. It is transparent and it is shameful.

• (2110)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Hon. Charles McElman: Not just yet!

Honourable senators, I have been in this chamber now for 21 years. This is the first time that I have heard the likes of what was said by the Leader of the Government.

Senator Guay: Shame!

Senator McElman: It was ungentlemanly.

Senator Murray: It was not that.

Senator McElman: It was contemptuous of the Senate itself. It showed a great sense of superiority on the part of the orator in dealing with one of our colleagues in particular.

Senator Murray: I regret he is not here, because I will say it to his face with considerable pleasure.

Senator Frith: That wouldn't make any difference.

Senator McElman: Whether he was here or not here does not change it in any sense. The honourable senator might want to take him out in the alley. I do not know. It makes no difference.

Senator Murray: His behaviour as chairman of that committee was shameful, and I will repeat it to his face.

Senator McElman: And in doing so the Honourable the Leader of the Government brings shame upon himself.

Senator Guay: Right on!

Senator McElman: He shows no regard for the rules of this place. He shows no regard for the rules and traditions of Parliament.

Senator Murray: What rules?

Senator McElman: What rules!

Senator Guay: He doesn't know them.

Senator Murray: What rules have I broken?

Senator McElman: It is against the rules to make disrespectful remarks about a colleague in either house.

Senator Murray: I have talked about his conduct of that committee, and I stand behind every word I said.

Senator McElman: And impute motives—

Senator Murray: Motives!

Senator McElman: —as the Honourable the Leader of the Government did with respect not only to the chairman of the committee, a respected Canadian—the honourable senator rolls his eyes. Some of us will soon be rolling our eyes about the quality of the leadership of the government in the Senate—

Senator Murray: Go ahead.

Senator McElman: —some of us who have had respect and warmth of friendship for that honourable gentleman. You have strained the bounds of everything this chamber stands for, my honourable colleague.

Senator Murray: I have not.

Senator McElman: This is the second day within the last ten days that you have done so. I, for one, as a person who has respected the honourable senator, caution him that if he wishes any respect in this chamber to gain control of himself.

Senator Murray: What is this lecture?

Senator McElman: You have been lecturing—

Senator Murray: Who is it coming from?

Senator McElman: You have been lecturing—

Senator Murray: I have accused honourable senators opposite of partisan mischief—

An Hon. Senator: Sit down!

An Hon. Senator: Order!

Senator Murray: I repeat it, and I point my finger.

An Hon. Senator: Order!

Senator Murray: And if you find that accusation too hard to take, then you shouldn't be here.

The Hon. the Speaker: Order, please!

Senator Corbin: You lectured us for 20 minutes, now sit down and listen.

Senator McElman: And now the Leader of the Government tells me that I should not be here.

Senator Murray: If you find that too hard to take, you shouldn't be here.

Senator McElman: So now we are establishing a new rule of the Senate.

Senator Lefebvre: A new order!

Senator McElman: A new rule of the Senate, that if we—

Senator Murray: If you can't take it, stay home!

Senator McElman: —do not satisfy the mood of the Leader of the Government, then we should not be here to be offensive to him. Let me tell the Honourable the Leader of the Government that he is not the ruler of this place simply because he is apparently the ruler of his forces. I find the information conveyed to us by the Leader of the Government in the Senate from his colleagues in the government also a display of arrogance and contempt for Parliament. This is a House of Parliament. It causes one to wonder. There are some who propose or suggest that the Senate should be abolished. It causes one to wonder how Canada would get on with a uni-cameral system with a government such as this in office. One wonders if the very fact of the Senate being here, which I contend has been of great value to the Canadian people, has held this government back somewhat. One wonders what would happen if it were not here. Well, they are starting to act as if it were not here, as if it were a uni-cameral system, and as if the House of Commons and the government, with its over-weening majority, can direct the other House of Parliament on what it should do and, now, can blackmail the Senate into doing its will.

I suggest to the honourable gentleman that there are those in this place who do have a respect for Parliament and who will continue to have respect for it. If it means that we must sit here all summer, Saturdays or whatever the government may try to impose—if we were put in that position, we would carry on out of our respect for Parliament, but, and it is a big but, the government expects cooperation within a bi-cameral system. The Leader of the Government referred to us as being not elected. I have heard all of that nonsense I want to hear. Non-elected! So we are not, apparently, legitimate within the system. Well, we have a Constitution in this country and we are here under that Constitution. It says we have every right to be here.

Senator Murray: You can defeat the bill.

Senator Frith: And that is all?

Senator McElman: It gives to this side of Parliament, this House of Parliament, certain rights—

Senator Murray: Almost equal rights, if you want to exercise them.

Senator McElman: —certain privileges and certain responsibilities.

Senator Murray: And you can exercise them.

Senator Frith: Like studying bills.

Senator McElman: Now, the Senate is exercising its duties and its responsibilities. It can be held in contempt by the Leader of the Government and by his colleagues if they wish, but, nonetheless, we have a responsibility here. Senator Frith has pointed out how short a time has been involved with some of these bills as far as the Senate is concerned. The Leader of the Government speaks of cooperation. I wonder what he thinks has been happening over the last 48 hours.

Senator Frith: He wasn't here.

Senator McElman: Cooperation was very great.

Senator Guay: He wasn't here!

Senator Frith: And this is the thanks we get for it.

Senator McElman: We heard not one word from the Deputy Leader of the Government in the tone used by the Leader of the Government. He is a gentleman, who acted as such and treated his colleagues as people who are also gentlemen.

Let me get back to what is involved here and give the Leader of the Government an example that is very similar to what is taking place now. A number of years ago the government of the day brought forward the Maritime Code Act. I am sure that the leader has heard of it. The government said that it was a very important bill. They spent a lot of time on it.

Senator Murray: You have told this story so often, this story of the one great example of independence in the past 20 years.

Senator McElman: My, my, how you mumble. In any event, the government said it was very important and they wanted the bill. Well, they did not get it before the recess. They were told why they would not get it, because it was a very bad bill, as Bill C-22 is a very bad bill, in the opinion of many parliamentarians in both houses.

Senator Murray: Then defeat it!

• (2120)

Senator McElman: What happened on that occasion was that the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications started taking the bill apart, and, as I recall, made some 130 amendments to the bill. Honourable senators, when did it do that? It did it during the summer recess. The government was anxious to have passage of the bill, but it did not call back the House of Commons; it did not try to interfere with the normal procedures of the Senate; it did not try to hold the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications in contempt, as the honourable senator has tried to do with one of our committees this evening. It let things proceed, because it had some little respect, at least, for the Senate and for its proceedings.

Senator Murray: I was around the Senate in 1967.

Senator McElman: Yes, and I am the one who advised you not to leave politics and to come back. Then I found you down in New Brunswick and asked you what the hell you were doing there. I gave you good advice. Tonight I regret giving it to you.

In any event, the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications did a superb job with that bill under the chairmanship of a senator who still sits here in the Senate. The committee virtually re-wrote the bill. That did not please the government, but it was a tremendously fine job done by a committee of the Senate and by the Senate itself.

I will give you another case in point: There was another Minister of Transport who brought in a bill to amend the Air Canada Act. There were several sections of that bill that were abusive to Parliament, in the opinion of several of us here in the Senate. We privately asked the Minister of Transport if he would accept amendments to the bill, and he refused. He was then told that if he was not prepared to accept amendments to the bill, which we put into the bill while it was referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, that he would not get his bill. The government was very unhappy; they did not agree with the amendments proposed by the Senate and by its committee. However, when the Senate said: "These are essential to the passage of the bill," and the Senate passed those amendments, the government accepted them, and we got the Air Canada Act. Therefore, there was an element of cooperation and understanding of the role of the two houses. I must not go on too long, because I am boring the Leader of the Government in the Senate—

Senator Murray: That bill came back without recommendation.

Senator McElman: As I say, honourable senators, I am boring the Leader of the Government in the Senate, even though he does natter and yatter along and continues to interrupt, in contravention of the rules which he speaks of so often as not being observed in this chamber.

Some time ago, in the Standing Committee on Standing Rules and Orders, we had a reference asking us to look at all bills and, where they affected provinces, to ensure that the provinces had an opportunity to express their interest. This was a natural outflow of the responsibilities of the Senate and the purpose for which it was formed; namely, to take into account the interests of the regions and the provinces.

In this case, five of the provinces made direct submissions that were opposed to this bill. Some of them said, "Kill it." Some of them—

Senator Murray: They have the votes.

Senator McElman: —said, "Amend it in accordance with the report that Parliament received," and all of them said it was going to cost them more money. Two more did not make formal presentations, but have since. That is seven out of ten provinces, representing far more than 50 per cent of the population. Does that ring any bells for the Honourable Leader of the Government? Seven out of ten provinces.

In the case of the Leader of the Government in the Senate, with his knowledge of why the Senate was formed and, being a martimer, of why the maritimes demanded its formation, one would think he would have some appreciation of the fact that when the provinces in such numbers and representing such an element of Canada put a point forward, the Government of Canada should be interested in what they put forward.

Senator Murray: The government is interested in the bill.

Senator McElman: The Government of Canada today says: "It does not matter what those provinces have to say; we stubborn people . . .", such as the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate, "... have made our stand and we will listen to no one, including the provincial governments." This is the same government which has now given every province a veto—or is attempting to give every province a veto. Honourable senators, I think that their chickens will come home to roost in a big way.

Senator Murray: You are against Meech Lake, too, are you?

Senator McElman: Honourable senators, it is the duty of this body to take into account the interests of the regions and the interests of the provinces. I hope that the Honourable Leader of the Government, if he has not already done so, will read the submission of the Province of New Brunswick; the province where he served as Deputy Minister to the Premier and where I served in a similar capacity. We both have a great interest in that province and great respect for that province. Theirs is a very concise and direct representation. I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate to read that brief itself, if no other. It will not take him long. Thereafter, I would ask him to ponder as to whether or not he has some responsibility to react and to try to convince his colleagues in the government to react and to understand why the Senate and the committee is now preparing to listen further to the provinces. Honourable senators, there is nothing wrong with that.

Senator Murray: That is repetition and a waste of time.

Senator McElman: That is a waste of time, in your opinion.

Senator Murray: Repetition and waste of time. Just look at the record.

Senator McElman: It is waste of time in your opinion, and that is just one person's opinion. We have a duty here not only to respect but to show reaction to the interests of the provinces, and at least those on this side of the house appear to want to do that.

Senator Murray: Well, you have the numbers.

Senator McElman: Numbers, numbers, numbers. If that is all the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate can do is count numbers, God forbid the day you get control of both houses—if you ever do, which I doubt will happen.

Honourable senators, it is probably a useless proposition to try to talk to the honourable senator. There are many other aspects of this bill that I could talk about. I will not do so. I simply say to you that the contempt for this house and the contempt for Parliament and for individual senators that has been displayed by the Honourable Leader of the Government and the arrogance he has shown tonight is unseemly and does him no credit.

Senator Murray: I stand by every word that I have said tonight.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I have just a very short question for the chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications. As you know, that committee has had referred to it Bill C-18 and Bill C-19. Senator Frith would have this house believe that the "Conservative dominated committee" this morning was in some way further delaying the study of these bills.

Senator Frith: No, you did the right thing.

Senator MacDonald: Honourable senators, I want to put a question to the chairman. This morning the chairman presented us with what we considered to be a first-class work plan. We were trying to determine whether we were going to have to duplicate that which has been done by the Transport Committee in the other place, which is an awesome task. There was something like 600 witnesses. We do not know what is ahead of us. We suggested that we use 30 days in which to ask for written submissions, following which we would meet in the steering committee, determine how we were going to do it, start the hearings in Ottawa, and then determine if we had to go on the road to the places which had been ignored.

● (2130)

The question was to the chairman of the Transport Committee. I ask you, Mr. Chairman, if you know of any way in which we could proceed at a faster pace than that which you had suggested this morning, which we Conservatives thought was an excellent plan.

Hon. Léopold Langlois: Twelve applications have been received to be heard by the Transport Committee. This morning, when we had a meeting of the committee, I made the suggestion, in order not to unduly delay this bill, that we should ask those 12 applicants to send us their briefs. We would give them a deadline of July 31, and then we would send a summary to all members of the committee, with the intent of resuming a study of the bill in the middle of September. I made that suggestion after having notified the members of the committee that I was in their hands and that I would accept what they would decide. The majority of the members present were Conservatives. There were two Liberals and three Conservatives present. They approved my suggestion unanimously.

Bill C-18 will come into force on January 1, 1988. I don't know what the rush is.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, there is a motion on the floor. Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt Senator Doody's motion?

Some Hon. Senators: Yes, it is.

Motion agreed to.

TO THE HONOURABLE SENATE OF CANADA, IN PARLIAMENT ASSEMBLED

The petition of the undersigned residents of Canada who now avail themselves of their ancient and undoubted right thus to present a grievance common to your Petitioners in the certain assurance that your honourable Senate will therefore provide a remedy,

HUMBLY SHEWETH

WHEREAS, the proposed changes to the Patent Act will affect directly all Canadians who are not protected by private or governmental medicare programs, and

WHEREAS the federal government's proposals will raise the costs, already high of the provincial health-care programs, and

WHEREAS the monopoly granted to innovate pharmaceutical companies will prevent competition from generic companies and will result in an increase of drug costs and prices and will severely restrict the ability of average Canadians to buy necessary prescription drugs, and,

WHEREAS the proposed changes to the Patent Act are another example of the Canadian government's concession to the Free Trade negotiations with the United States, at the expense of everyday Canadians.

WHEREFORE, the undersigned, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon parliament to reject these proposals which will increase prescription drug prices for Canadians.

And as in duty bound your petitioners will ever pray.

PLENARY (Committees I, II and III)

- Cultural sovereignty
- Bilateral trade negotiations

The following summary highlights issues discussed in Plenary and the three Committees. A final and much fuller report on discussions under each agenda item will be tabled subsequently.

Plenary

As usual, the plenary was reserved for discussion of a topic of particular importance. This year's plenary was devoted to bilateral free trade and cultural sovereignty. Canadian speakers led off on this topic, reporting on the approach adopted by the Canadian government—the desire for a comprehensive agreement, the need for securing the agreement of the provinces to any elements of an agreement falling within provincial jurisdiction and the importance of achieving a fair, impartial and binding method for resolving disputes under rules agreed to by both sides.

American speakers expressed some doubt that such a massive agreement could be negotiated by October 5. Some of them showed a willingness, if an agreement was close to completion, of extending the fast track authority through adding a clause to the Trade and International Economic Policy Act of 1987, (H.R. 3). However, U.S. Senators warned that Senate approval of any extension might be difficult to achieve.

The American participants asked if a special plenary session could be arranged to permit the Canadian side to explain the significance of the Meech Lake agreement. This was done and a lively discussion between Canadian participants ensued, which the Americans appeared to appreciate.

Committee I

Discussion in Committee I on trade and economic questions covered most of the current bilateral problems in this area. The Chairman of the House Ways & Means Sub-Committee on Trade explained the objectives of H.R. 3. He placed special emphasis on the attempt to develop a new definition of subsidies. When Canadian participants pointed out that this represented a unilateral action and that it would be preferable to proceed by international agreement in the GATT negotiations, he expressed dissatisfaction with the pace of these negotiations and preferred to seek de facto agreement or change by encouraging other countries to introduce mirror legislation.

Discussion on recent proposals regarding film distribution in Canada was quite vigorous. Canadian speakers explained why some action by Canada was necessary. All American speakers professed to understand the Canadian objectives, but they objected strongly to the means chosen which they described as "an import licensing system in restraint of trade and in violation of international agreements". They urged Canada to seek a resolution sanctioned by GATT and in particular suggested consideration of a quota.

Committee II

In response to arguments by Canadian delegates in Committee II urging U.S. support for Canada's claim of sovereignty over the internal waters of the Arctic archipelago, U.S. delegates argued that such recognition would create unacceptable precedents for free navigation in other international straits. Further, the immediate response of the U.S. spokesman was critical of the Canadian White Paper proposal to purchase and equip 10 nuclear-powered submarines for the Arctic. He doubted that the submarines would be effective in strengthening Canada's sovereignty claim, nor would they add to Arctic security since their mission was to monitor intruders rather than to attack. In his opinion, Canada could better use the huge sums of money involved to upgrade its defence commitments in Europe or to buy new frigates. Canadian participants emphasized that the new submarines would be used not only in the Arctic but in Pacific and Atlantic waters as well. In respect to the sovereignty aspect, the Canadian side stressed the unique character of the Arctic archipelago and reminded the U.S. delegates that Canada was prepared to submit the case for arbitration by the international Court of Justice.

In the energy field, U.S. delegates on Committee II could offer little but sympathy to Canadian spokesmen who complained about the recent FERC decision on natural gas billing prices which effectively disallows the pass-through to U.S. customers of some transmission costs in Canadian gas export rates. While noting that the FERC decision was open to a court challenge, a senior U.S. Senator said it was likely that Canadian exporters could lose their U.S. market if they failed to adjust their prices.

In respect to the proposed U.S. oil import tax, U.S. spokesmen said such a tax was a distinct possibility in this Congress due to the increased influence of Congressmen from oil-producing states, to U.S. concern for the security of its oil production and to the welcome revenue such a tax would produce. An exemption for Canada from this tax was unlikely.

Committee III

As in previous years, acid rain was the most intensely discussed environmental issue. Canadian delegates pointed out that for years the United States has been responding to criticism by telling Canada to put its own house in order and Canada is now doing so. New, stricter auto emission standards, the clean-up of smelters and the federal-provincial agreement to reduce SO<sup>2</sup> emissions by 50 percent by 1994 were cited as examples of Canada's commitment to acid rain abatement. Meanwhile there has been U.S. progress on rhetoric and research but no commitment to a program of acid rain control, with targets and timetable. The American delegates expressed sympathy with the Canadian position but once more described the familiar political and economic roadblocks to action. A member of the House delegation reported on proposed legislation that would cut SO<sup>2</sup> emissions by about 30 percent in the next decade but a U.S. Senator expressed serious doubt that the bill would pass.

A number of fisheries issues occupied the greatest part of Committee III's agenda. There was an extended and pointed exchange on the membership of the Pacific Salmon Commission. The American spokesman expressed concern that Canada was appointing industry representatives instead of fisheries managers with negative consequences for conservation and enhancement of the salmon stock. They warned that if Canada persisted, the U.S. government would be pressured to do the same. Canadian members expressed full support for good management practices under the Pacific Salmon Treaty and insisted that the appointment of users to the Commission was consistent with that objective, but went on to say that Canada had been badly burned in past negotiations because users had been ignored. The two sides agreed there should be discussions aimed at harmonizing the two countries' approaches to the Commission.

Many issues concerning the east coast fishery were discussed but perhaps two stood out—U.S. membership in the North-west Atlantic Fisheries Organization (NAFO) and the problems arising from expanding seal populations. Canadian delegates stressed the desirability of the United States joining NAFO both to strengthen its management of fish stocks beyond the 200 mile limit and to reassure Canadian fishermen angered by unregulated American fishing on the tail of the Grand Banks. American delegates reported that Congress had authorized U.S. membership in NAFO in 1983 but the hangup was the inability or unwillingness of NAFO members to provide a U.S. quota, which both sides agreed was a prerequisite.

The issue of the rapidly growing seal population was not a formal item on the agenda but it provoked lively discussion. Some American delegates were surprised by and keenly interested in Canadian reports of damage to the fish stock (by consumption and worm infestation) arising from the mushrooming grey seal population. West Coast American delegates reported similar damage being done to the salmon stock by seals and sea lions. Both sides agreed that a controlled cull of the seal population would be essential in future and that the subject should be on next year's Committee III agenda.

PRESCRIPTION DRUG PRICES

EFFECT OF PROPOSED PATENT ACT AMENDMENT—PETITIONS TABLED

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have petitions that I would like to table today on the subject of Bill C-22, on which petitions there are 249 names of people from the province of Alberta who have all written to indicate their concern about that bill. They come from a number of cities, including: Edmonton, Calgary, Lethbridge, Taber, Medicine Hat, Red Deer, Redcliff, Bashaw, Edson, Cold Lake, Innisfail, Coaldale, Claresholm and Vegreville.

THE SENATE

REFERRAL OF SUBJECT MATTER OF GOVERNMENT BILLS TO COMMITTEES—NOTICE OF INQUIRY

Hon. Finlay MacDonald: Honourable senators, I give notice that on Thursday next, July 9, 1987, I will call the attention of the Senate to the practice of referring the subject matter of government bills to the appropriate Senate committees.

QUESTION PERIOD

VIA RAIL

RELOCATION OF MAINTENANCE CENTRE FROM WINNIPEG TO VANCOUVER—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government, as a member of the cabinet, if he would again make representations to the cabinet with regard to VIA Rail maintenance which is being moved out of Winnipeg to Vancouver. Mr. Leo Duguay, the MP representing my area, said in the Winnipeg Free Press on Saturday:

If (Pawley)—

He means the provincial government.

—has any proof that it makes better sense and can save taxpayers more money to leave it in Winnipeg then I'll take it to the minister and we'll change his mind.

That is a definite statement.

An Hon. Senator: Good luck!

Senator Guay: If he, as a backbench member of Parliament, can "change his mind," then surely the Leader of the Government in the Senate, being a member of the cabinet, can also change the mind of the minister.

I say that because it will cost the government $20 million for the new installation in Vancouver, and the funny part of it is that they will have to spend another $7 million in Winnipeg to build an additional station to service two area trains in Manitoba. So the total would be $27 million to save possibly $4 million to $10 million annually.

After the loss of personnel and wage earners from my area, and after losing the CF-18 contract, surely to goodness the government should leave something in Manitoba, which is the keystone province of this country. In my humble opinion, it would make sense to see VIA Rail retain its maintenance facilities at a central point in this country rather than having an installation on the west coast and another in Montreal. It seems to me that Winnipeg is the logical place to service those trains.

Therefore, I repeat my question: Will the Leader of the Government make an appropriate representation to cabinet to reconsider this important matter so that we in Manitoba can benefit from that decision?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will undertake to convey the honourable senator's representation to the minister who reports to Parliament for VIA Rail.

I may say that the explanation given by VIA Rail for its decision is that the new high-powered locomotives that are in service can go from Montreal or Toronto to Vancouver without the need of intermediate mechanical inspection in Winnipeg. Therefore, VIA Rail is establishing another facility, an equipment maintenance centre, in Winnipeg at a cost of approximately $7 million, as the honourable senator has pointed out.

The honourable senator may look upon this as a consolation prize, but I am sure he will agree that it would be pointless to subject locomotives, which do not require it, to intermediate mechanical inspection in Winnipeg.

Senator Guay: I do not agree with the Leader of the Government for the simple reason that it does not make sense. If a locomotive can go from Montreal to Vancouver, surely to goodness it can go from Winnipeg to Vancouver and back to Winnipeg. It is not a valid reason to say that a locomotive can go from Montreal to Vancouver, when it could go from Winnipeg to Vancouver and back to Winnipeg, and it would not be necessary to change any of the services now in Winnipeg.

It always seems that when those decisions are taken we are on the losing end. I am trying to be nice about the whole thing, but it is becoming a painful thing to absorb all the time, when we are always on the losing end. For that reason I am saying to the Leader of the Government that surely to goodness, being a member of the cabinet, he can do a better job than Leo Duguay in making a good representation to the cabinet to reconsider the matter.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, again, I will undertake to convey Senator Guay's representations to the government, but I simply make the point in concluding, I hope, that the convenience of the passengers and, therefore, the overall health of the VIA Rail service is something that has to be paramount in the minds of those who are making the decisions.

THE CONSTITUTION

FIRST MINISTERS' ACCORD—YUKON AND NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—METHOD OF APPOINTMENT OF SENATORS AND SUPREME COURT JUDGES

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I am sure that given the time the leader has had to study the Meech Lake accord and considering that he was one of the authors of it, he can explain the situation with respect to the appointment of Supreme Court judges and senators from the Yukon and the Northwest Territories. Subsection 101C.(4) reads:

Where an appointment is made in accordance with subsection (2) otherwise than as required under subsection (3), the Governor General in Council shall appoint a person whose name has been submitted by the government of a province other than Quebec.

It seems to me that what we are saying is that senators and Supreme Court judges from the provinces will be appointed from a list supplied by premiers. It does not say that the Yukon or the Northwest Territories will have a different list. In fact, it says nothing about the two territories. Would the Leader of the Government explain to the Senate what the new procedure is for appointing senators and Supreme Court judges from the two territories, according to the new constitutional accord?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, it is the same as the present procedure. In any case, the honourable senator will have an opportunity to explore this matter in more detail with me and with officials when we appear before the Committee of the Whole later in this session on this matter, or, indeed, before the Special Joint Committee of the Senate and the House of Commons which was recently set up.

Senator Lucier: Honourable senators, that answer is not quite good enough. We have already been told that we can ask all the questions we want, but the accord will not be changed.

Nowhere does it say in the accord how senators and Supreme Court judges will be chosen. It outlines the procedure for the provinces, but it does not say what will be done in the territories. If the procedure is to remain the same as before, why was something to that effect not put in the accord?

Honourable senators, since the leader has not risen to reply, I just want to say that that is just about the answer I expected!

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

TREATMENT OF LEGISLATION

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I and, I believe, other senators are concerned that an impasse seems to have arisen between the wishes of the government and this chamber in respect of legislation. I appreciate that there may also be division in this respect between members of one side of the Senate and the other. I ask the Leader of the Government in the Senate: Has he any new information or any information he can bring to our attention in this chamber as to how we will conduct procedure on this legislation and how we can overcome this unfortunate impasse?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I do not think I can add very much to what is already on the public record. As I indicated to the Senate on Tuesday evening, the Deputy Prime Minister requested of Mr. Speaker Fraser that the House of Commons be recalled. The honourable senator will be aware that Mr. Speaker Fraser has decided to defer a decision on that matter—

Senator Guay: He must have read the Debates of the Senate.

Senator Murray:—pending possible resolution of the issues between the government and the Senate. The government, through the deputy leader, Senator Doody, had proposed on Tuesday last that the Senate adjourn and that the committees have several weeks to continue their work on these bills, with the understanding that they would report and that the Senate would finally dispose of the matters sometime during the third week of July. That proposal was rejected by the opposition. I am sure that my friend heard the Leader of the Opposition say on Tuesday night that for their part they would have disposed of the bills sometime before the middle of September. Honourable senators, that is not soon enough for the government, so we are in what the honourable senator describes as an impasse.

● (1410)

The bills are now in committee, and the government would be prepared to have the responsible ministers appear before those committees today or tomorrow. Mr. Andre is in town, and I would need a little more notice to have Mr. Crosbie attend, but the responsible ministers could appear before those committees to try to persuade the committees of their own volition to compress their work into several weeks, and perhaps that would enable the Senate to adjourn and obviate the necessity of calling back the House of Commons for the moment. It is, of course, understood that the House of Commons will have to come back, in any case, for Royal Assent, and possibly to deal with any amendments that the majority in the Senate might make to one or other of these bills.

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: I have a supplementary question for the Honourable Leader of the Government in the Senate. I wonder if the honourable leader is aware that it was Senator Phillips who made the motion to send the bill to committee. The motion was not made by a senator on this side of the house; it was Senator Phillips who made the actual motion to send the matter to committee, and that is detailed in Debates of the Senate.

Senator Murray: There are three bills; I am not sure which bill the honourable senator is referring to.

Senator Guay: I am referring to Bill C-22.

Senator Murray: Bill C-22 has had 75 hours of hearing and pre-study by the special committee appointed for that purpose. As I recall, the special committee reported without recommendation. It is customary, even after a lengthy and exhaustive pre-study of that nature, to refer such a bill to the committee so that it can go over the bill clause by clause. Neither Senator Phillips nor anyone else on the government side anticipated that honourable senators opposite would propose to take the rest of the summer to complete the work.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: May I also point out to Senator Guay that the motion establishing a special committee for Bill C-22 required that bill to be referred back to the Special Committee on Bill C-22.

Senator Guay: And that is why you did it?

Senator Phillips: That is why I did it, in an effort to speed things up.

Senator Guay: I am glad you are admitting it, anyway.

Senator Murray: I should also draw to the attention of honourable senators the fact that since last November the government has been trying to have the transport bills pre-studied and has met with no success in having that proposition accepted by the opposition.

Senator Guay: I would like to remind the Leader of the Government in the Senate that I was making reference only to Bill C-22. I am not talking about Bill C-259. If you would like me to discuss Bill C-259, I will take that up, too.

Hon. Eymard G. Corbin: Honourable senators, I would like to ask the Leader of the Government why it is that the government has taken the exceptional stand—and I say this in contrast with past practices of the government—of not introducing legislation in the Senate any more—or, to be fair, practically never.

It has been the practice of past governments to introduce major pieces of legislation in the Senate, allowing the Senate weeks, and sometimes months, to scrutinize its legislation, and then to have it forwarded, after disposal in this house, to the other place. Since this government has been in power, why is it that that practice has been abandoned? Why, in return, does it expect this house to jump at the sound of the gun every time somebody in the other place pulls a trigger? Are we not allowed to rethink and re-examine legislation passed in the other place? Is the honourable leader suggesting that pre-study is sufficient reason for the Senate not to re-examine legislation that is substantially amended in the other place before it gets here?

What about the tons and the truckloads of amendments made to legislation over there, which, most of the time, are not examined in pre-studies? Are we simply to discard those as not important, and jump at the sound of the gun? What is the purpose of this chamber of sober second thought if all we are expected to do is rubber-stamp and rubber-stamp? I would like a dissertation on that.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, there are a number of questions raised by Senator Corbin.

The situation he describes with regard to truckloads of amendments being made in the other place does not apply to the bills in question. It certainly does not apply to Bill C-22.

The government is well aware of the constitutional role of the Senate and respects it as a chamber of "sober second thought". However, 75 hours of hearings on this bill by the Senate, on top of 87 hours of debate in the House of Commons and 63 hours in committee, seems to be quite a lot of sobriety.

Senator Corbin: It is not extraordinary.

Senator Murray: The honourable senator says it is not extraordinary. I think it is rather extraordinary for a bill of that kind. I pointed this out the other night, but I will underline it again for my honourable friend. In many cases, the witnesses heard by the Senate committee on Bill C-22 were the very same witnesses as had been heard by the House of Commons.

As I pointed out the other night, the Senate committee heard, for example, from the CLC. Fine. They then heard from the CLC in its various provincial emanations: Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, Alberta, Northwest Territories, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and Ontario. The Senate committee heard from the national group of the Consumers' Association of Canada, and then proceeded to receive almost exactly the same brief from six provincial branches of the Consumers' Association of Canada.

Senator Frith: Isn't it a shame that you have to listen to those people. Imagine actually listening to what people have to say!

Senator Murray: This is a lot of sober second thought. There was a very great deal of repetition in the consideration of that bill. As I have pointed out, there was much opportunity for the Senate Transport Committee to have conducted a study into the transport bill.

With regard to the presentation of legislation in this place, my friend is aware that there is a problem with presenting money bills here. We cannot do it. So far as other bills are concerned, the tradition has been that complicated but non-controversial legislation is frequently introduced in the Senate rather than in the other place. Unfortunately, much of the legislation has been complex, is also controversial, or is in the category of money bills. So, the government has chosen to proceed in the traditional way through the House of Commons first, and then in the Senate.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

FEASIBILITY STUDY OF "SNOWBIRDS" VISIT TO NATO ALLIES— REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Leave having been given to revert to Reports of Committees:

Hon. Paul C. Lafond: Honourable senators, the Special Committee on National Defence has the honour to present its third report, respecting the feasibility, logistics and merits of a visit by Canada's air demonstration team, the "Snowbirds", to our NATO allies in Europe in the near future. I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate and the Debates of the Senate of this day and that it form part of the permanent records of this house.

● (1420)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it agreed?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see appendix, p. 1618.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Lafond: Honourable senators, as far as I am concerned, the report is self-explanatory and I have no further comment to make on it. However, since it is a report on a study resulting from a motion of Senator Bosa, perhaps it should be put on the Orders of the Day for the next sitting to give Senator Bosa an opportunity to offer his comments.

On motion of Senator Lafond, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Hon. Duff Roblin: Honourable senators, before the question is put, I rise on a point of order.

I am told that I am now to be a member of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications for a short time to replace one of my colleagues. I would like to address a question to the chairman of that committee, Senator Langlois.

When is it the intention of the honourable senator, who is chairman of the Transport Committee, to have that committee meet?

Hon. Léopold Langlois: The committee will probably meet tomorrow, but, as yet, a time has not been set.

Senator Roblin: Will we be given adequate notice of the time the committee is to meet?

Senator Langlois: Yes.

Senator Roblin: What does the honourable senator think will be on the agenda?

Senator Langlois: The committee will be dealing with Bills C-19 and C-18.

Senator Roblin: Are any witnesses to be called?

Senator Langlois: That is up to the committee.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): That committee has already unanimously approved a work program.

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, is it your pleasure to adopt the motion?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

The Senate adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

THIRD REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

MONDAY, July 6, 1987

The Special Committee of the Senate on National Defence has the honour to present its

THIRD REPORT

Your Committee, which was authorized to examine the feasibility, logistics and merits of a visit by Canada's air demonstration team the "Snowbirds" to our NATO allies in Europe in the near future, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Wednesday, June 17, 1987, examined the matter and now reports as follows:

The Director of Air Doctrine and operations of Air Command appeared before your Committee on June 26th and presented a full briefing on the substance and conclusions of a feasibility study conducted by and for Air Command on a Snowbirds European Tour, which study was concluded and presented in December 1986.

The evidence established that:

- (1) The aircraft currently used by the Snowbirds in their operation is incapable of self-displacement from Canada to Europe.
- (2) Displacement by other means, sea or air, would incur considerable cost in carrier fees and man-hours in dismantling and reassembling, or crating. ($2-$3 million)
- (3) While the performances of the snowbirds are scheduled in advance (2-3 years) in Canada and North America, the organization of a series of similar performances in Europe would require a similar period to arrange for suitable sites, suitable fuel availability, co-ordination of schedules with appropriate aeronautical events and sometimes liaison in unfamiliar language in host countries.

Your Committee agreed that no further testimony seemed to be required.

While agreeing fully with the merits of such an initiative from a public relations and goodwill aspect, in view of the pressures currently applied on DND funding and manpower, your Committee is of the view that it would be unwise to recommend or to pursue this undertaking at this time.

Should, however, at some point in the future, Canada's air display squadron operate aircraft capable of self-displacement across the Atlantic, the suggestion should be reviewed.

Respectfully submitted,

PAUL C. LAFOND

PATENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell, Chairman of the Special Committee of the Senate on Bill C-22, to amend the Patent Act, presented the following report:

Tuesday, July 7, 1987

The Special Committee of the Senate on the Bill C-22, An Act to amend the Patent Act and to provide for certain matters in relation thereto, (formerly entitled the Special Committee of the Senate on the subject-matter of the Bill C-22), has the honour to present its

FIFTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bill C-22, An Act to amend the Patent Act and to provide for certain matters in relation thereto, reports that at its meeting of today, 7th July, 1987, the Committee resolved that it would report the Bill C-22 to the Senate no later than Monday, 10th August, 1987.

Respectfully submitted,

M. LORNE BONNELL
Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 44(1)(e), I move that this report be taken into consideration now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I ask permission to say a few words at this time concerning this motion.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators—

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bonnell:—Bill C-22 seems to have caught the eye of the Canadian people. It seems, finally, to have caught the eye of Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: You have for a long time.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Buckwold: That is only when he opens them.

Senator Bonnell: I would be more than pleased if, during my few remarks this afternoon, Senator Flynn would restrain himself in order to hear me out.

An Hon. Senator: He cannot do it.

Senator Barootes: Forget the personal remarks and get on with it.

Senator Bonnell: If Senator Barootes wishes to say a few words, he can adjourn the debate.

In the meantime, honourable senators, I would like to say that just this morning the Special Committee on Bill C-22 studied this bill during an in camera meeting. After discussion, it was unanimously decided to report the bill no later than August 10. Honourable senators, that will mean that we will have to work many hours during the next several weeks. Members of this committee have said that they are prepared to do so to try to facilitate the passage, the rejection or the amendment of this bill.

We have been told by the leadership of this house that it is important that the bill pass quickly. We have yet to hear the reason why, but we have invited the minister and his staff to appear before the committee when the Senate rises today. We will ask the minister that question this afternoon.

Let me tell honourable senators that in the view of the committee there are several aspects of this bill that need further study. I will list some of those things that we think are important. First, we have not as yet done a clause-by-clause study of this bill. We would like to do such a study and look into the detailed meaning of each clause of the bill and how it will affect the price of drugs for the consumer, how it will affect research in this country, how it will affect the development of the drug industry in this country, and how it will affect costs to the provinces. The committee is very interested in the cost of this legislation to the consumer. We have found in our hearings that the bill will cost the Province of Ontario, for example, $1 billion over the next ten years. If that is the case, they do not really know where they will find those funds. We heard from the generic drug people that the cost of this bill to the consumers could be exorbitant. We heard from Dr. Eastman that the cost was up to $211 million in 1985. What will be the cost in 1987, when the new generic drugs have come on to the market? What will happen when the 40 new drugs from the pipeline come onto the market? How many millions of dollars will that cost the Canadian consumer?

We have heard that many drugs come into Canada and, because of the Health Protection Branch study, which I think most members of the committee felt was important, that it takes four to six years for the department to put its approval on these drugs. We would like to hear from the department why it takes so long in Canada to put a stamp of approval on some of these drugs. The committee was also told by many groups across the country that the Price Review Board is unconstitutional, that the federal government has no jurisdiction to put price controls on these drugs, as it would do under the terms of Bill C-22. We have received letters from people who understand the law better than I do to the effect that there is a possibility that this legislation could be constitutionally ultra vires as far as the Price Review Board is concerned. We have been told by many groups across the country that the Price Review Board has no teeth. Therefore, in the committee's opinion, we should see whether the board has any teeth, and we should look into the possibility of strengthening the powers of the board.

There are many things about this bill that, in the view of the committee, need further study. However, the committee felt it was not necessary to travel to Calgary, Montreal or Vancouver, as was suggested by the Leader of the Government the other day. So, we had not made that decision to travel outside of Ottawa.

• (1410)

Let me say that one of the major concerns of the committee is the cost that will be imposed on the provinces, and the cost to the provinces of those pipeline drugs when they are taken off the market. Another concern is related to the retroactivity aspect of this legislation. Certain drugs would have to come off the market, because the legislation is retroactive to, I believe, June 1986. The fact that the legislation is retroactive is of concern to some of us; but there does not appear to be any real need to rush the passing of this legislation, because it is retroactive anyway.

For example, let me tell honourable senators some of the concerns of the Province of Prince Edward Island. The government believes that Bill C-22 may not be the right answer. It is its opinion that a better balance should be found. The Province is of the view that the bill would lead to higher drug costs, which could have a dramatic and adverse effect on programs which serve senior citizens.

The Government of Prince Edward Island felt that increased drug costs would also affect health care costs in general and would produce additional cost pressures which it could ill afford. Prince Edward Island noted that the existence of the $100,000 transitional fund is Ottawa's recognition of the inevitability of increased drug costs.

The Government of Newfoundland and Labrador expects that the bill will result in higher drug prices. It concluded that the net effect of the bill would be higher drug prices for all consumers.

Hon. Jacques Flynn: That is not something new. That is not something that you did not tell us in your report, when you completed your travel across the country. You are repeating, for the hundredth time—

Senator Hastings: Listen!

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I rise on a point of order—

Senator Hastings: You did not say that.

Senator Guay: What is your point of order?

Senator Flynn: I did not say that, but it was quite obvious. I am asking whether he is dealing with the report of his special, his very special committee made to the Senate some two weeks ago. That is what he is repeating.

Senator Guay: It is nice to hear it.

Senator Hastings: It bears repeating.

Senator Flynn: You would like to hear it again?

Senator Guay: Certainly.

Senator Flynn: I don't know why they did not put Senator Guay on that committee. You would have been a great asset. You are pretty good.

Senator Guay: Will you repeat it, please? I can't hear you.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: I have not got your voice.

Senator Guay: You haven't got a voice.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I am afraid that Senator Flynn did not hear my request at the beginning. Will he please sit in his seat and listen?

Senator Flynn: I rise on a point of order.

Senator Bonnell: What is your point of order?

Senator Flynn: Will you accept that you are dealing with something that we have dealt with before, and that the present report deals only with the time limit that the committee has accepted to report the bill?

Senator Guay: It is for those who were not here.

Senator Flynn: Senator Guay, you are certainly not going to repeat everything for senators who do not attend.

Senator Guay: I can hear you loud and clear.

Senator Flynn: You are very noisy.

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators—

Senator Flynn: We know where you stand, Senator Thériault. You have been against the bill since the beginning. You want to delay and delay. But that's all right; I don't mind that.

Some Hon. Senators: Order!

Senator Flynn: I did not intervene. Senator Thériault intervened.

[Senator Bonnell.]

Senator Thériault: Honourable senators, on a point of order, was Senator Flynn not in the house earlier when my colleague, Senator Bonnell, asked for unanimous consent to speak?

Senator Flynn: Yes, to deal with today's report, not the report of two weeks ago.

Senator Thériault: You could not take it then.

Senator Flynn: Don't be stupid.

Senator Thériault: I would be like you if I were.

Senator Flynn: I am satisfied that you are not like me.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I cannot understand my honourable friend, Senator Flynn.

Senator Guay: Nor can anyone else!

Senator Flynn: Certainly not you.

Senator Bonnell: I have presented a very important report, and I am trying to tell honourable senators that we are trying to rush this study—

Senator Flynn: We have heard that before.

Senator Bonnell: —the issues that have come before the committee and the concerns of the committee.

One of the issues is cost, and different groups have presented to us their concerns in this area. One of the areas involving cost that has been presented to us is cost to the provinces. If Senator Flynn has no concern for the provinces—

Senator Flynn: Come on!

Senator Bonnell: —that is up to him, but I can tell you that the committee is concerned, as I am concerned—

Senator Flynn: I know what your concern is!

Senator Bonnell: As I say, the committee is concerned. Members of the committee listened very attentively, as we travelled across the land. The Government of Newfoundland and Labrador expects the bill to result in higher drug prices. They concluded that the net effect of the bill would be "higher prices for drugs to all consumers, higher premiums for those enrolled in drug programs, and no significant development or increase of pharmaceutical-related manufacturing and/or research work for Newfoundland and Labrador." Any changes to the compulsory licensing system should take the Eastman report recommendations into account. The Yukon government appeared before us, and they feel that the bill is not "in the best economic or health interest of Canadians." They questioned why health care dollars should go to support already profitable multinational drug companies, and in its view serious consideration should be given to adopting the Eastman report or limiting exclusivity to those companies which are carrying out the synthesis, manufacture and compounding of drug products in Canada. The Yukon government noted that it would not benefit from the PMACs research and development commitments.

The Government of New Brunswick, in commenting on the current Patent Act, asked, "Why change a system that works so well?" It also noted that the Canadian system is viewed by many in the United States as a model to emulate. New Brunswick estimates that the bill would add $2 million annually to its drug expenditures. The effectiveness of the Drug Prices Review Board was also questioned by New Brunswick. That the board does not have the authority to investigate and control the prices of generic drugs was viewed as a major weakness in the board's powers. The province was particularly concerned that "generic manufacturers may attempt to rectify lost future anticipated revenue due to the delayed entry of new generic products by increasing prices substantially." The Government of Ontario believes—

Senator Barootes: You have missed out Quebec as you come west.

Senator Bonnell: I am coming to Quebec.

An Hon. Senator: You shouldn't have said that.

Senator Bonnell: The Government of Ontario believes that Bill C-22 could increase Ontario Drug Benefit Plan costs "to the point where this important health care benefit in Ontario could become financially untenable." That is the word they used, "untenable." The total cost of this bill to taxpayers might reach "$1 billion over ten years."

Senator Flynn: Or over 50 years.

Senator Bonnell: Ontario also noted that the bill is expected to add to the costs in other less obvious ways, such as increased cost to provinces to monitor drug prices, to make submissions to the board and to challenge and defend board decisions.

● (1420)

Ontario also questioned the quality of the promised R&D expenditures. In Ontario's evaluation, the federal government has overestimated the benefits of Bill C-22 and, to a great extent, underestimated the bill's associated costs.

With respect to Manitoba, the Manitoba government believes that Bill C-22 will result in, and I quote:

... a substantial increase in the cost of drugs to Canadian consumers and provincial treasuries.

To Manitoba the bill penalizes the:

... generic drug industry and rewards foreign owned manufacturers.

With respect to PMAC's R&D commitment, Manitoba said:

We do not see any guarantees ...

In 1986 Manitobans saved $14 million by using generic drugs. The Manitoba government has calculated possible price increases resulting from Bill C-22 of over 400 per cent in the next ten years, and the cost of delaying generic drug production at over $1 billion.

Honourable senators, let me tell you now about British Columbia. I received a letter dated June 17, 1986, from Mr. Stephen Rogers, Minister of Intergovernmental Relations, which said:

The Government of British Columbia continues to be of the view that the concerns it raised earlier have not been satisfactorily addressed in Bill C-22.

Therefore, honourable senators, let me tell you what concerns they raised earlier. In a letter addressed to the minister, Mr. Andre, and signed by the Minister of Health for British Columbia, it says:

The proposed amendments are of significant importance for British Columbia with respect to pharmaceutical costs and pharmaceutical research and development.

I still have some serious concerns with respect to increased pharmaceutical costs, Federal compensation, and the amount and locale of increased investment in pharmaceutical research and development. Therefore, I would appreciate the opportunity for further consultation and further information with respect to these matters. Accordingly, I am hopeful that I will have the opportunity of discussing the proposed amendments to the Patent Act with your Colleague . . .

There was also a letter from the former British Columbia Minister of Health saying:

I am also concerned that proposed federal compensation would not be adequate. It is my view that the present compulsory licensing provisions of the Patent Act are effective in moderating pharmaceutical prices and ought to be retained.

Honourable senators, that is British Columbia.

With respect to the other provinces, let me say that we wrote to each province and each territory and invited them to appear before our committee. The provinces from whose opinions I quoted either appeared before the committee, sent briefs to the committee or sent letters. Only one of those provinces appeared before the House of Commons, and that was the Province of Manitoba.

The other day, I understand, in my absence, the Leader of the Government in the Senate said that the Province of Quebec appeared before the committee. To the best of my knowledge, honourable senators, the Province of Quebec never appeared before our committee, and neither did the Province of Saskatchewan nor did the Province of Alberta.

Senator Barootes: Didn't the Director of the Drug Committee from Saskatchewan appear before the committee?

Senator Bonnell: The Director of the Drug Committee might well have appeared, but was he representing the Government of Saskatchewan? As far as I understand it, if he was from the Drug Committee, he was not supporting the bill. As I understand it, none of those provinces sent a government representative to the committee.

Senator Barootes: Whom did you think he was representing, then?

Senator Bonnell: Do you think he was representing the Government of Saskatchewan by himself?

Senator Barootes: He was representing their viewpoint.

Senator Bonnell: If that is the case then the Province of Saskatchewan is against the bill.

Senator Barootes: That is not so.

Senator Bonnell: Let me say that to my knowledge no province appeared to support this legislation; not even the Province of Quebec.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Flynn: Come on!

An Hon. Senator: Tell the truth!

Hon. Michel Cogger: Would the honourable senator respond to a question?

Senator Bonnell: Yes, I will permit a question.

Senator Cogger: Would Senator Bonnell not agree that when we were sitting in Quebec City, on June 12, the Minister of Industry and Commerce, the Honourable Daniel Johnson, held a press conference urging the Senate to go ahead with this legislation? His communiqué, issued at his press conference, was later filed with the workings of the committee. That is part of the record, senator, do you not agree?

An Hon. Senator: They did not appear.

Senator Phillips: You were on the bus, then!

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I do not disagree with that. If the premier, or the minister, or someone held a press conference and disagreed—that is possible.

Senator Flynn: Of course it was before the committee in Quebec City!

Senator Bonnell: If they filed their report with the committee, that is true, it is tabled. But there was no one there on behalf of the government, as I understand it, to present a brief or to—

An Hon. Senator: Be fair!

Senator Bonnell: —or to table a brief themselves.

Senator Flynn: He hears only what he wants to!

An Hon. Senator: He hears reform; he wants reform!

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, let me tell you—

Senator Nurgitz: Very judicious!

Senator Bonnell: —that this piece of legislation that is before us today—

An Hon. Senator: What is that word?

Senator Bonnell: —is of great concern to our Canadian people; there is concern expressed by many groups.

I will not take any longer on this debate, because I know that we want to get on with other motions, but, if you wish, I can take longer. In fact, if you want me to, since Senator Flynn likes to hear more—

Senator Flynn: No I don't! I stand on a point of order again. I will ask the Chair to rule on the irrelevancy of your speech.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh!

Senator Flynn: If the Chair says that it is relevant, you will hear something from our side.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I am trying to tell you the importance of—

Senator Flynn: Yes, you are trying to, but you are not succeeding!

Senator Bonnell: Well, I did not succeed with you, I will admit, but I have been trying for years to tell you something.

Senator Flynn: You succeed with those who will applaud anything, like Senator Stollery, for instance, who finds you interesting, but not other people.

Senator Bonnell: That is good; I will read some more, then.

Senator Stollery: Yes, I do—very informative!

An Hon. Senator: Keep it going, Senator Bonnell!

Senator Bonnell: Let me read to you, honourable senators, what I have received over the weekend. First, there is a telegram which was forwarded to me by the Honourable Guy Charbonneau, Speaker of the Senate. It states:

We urge that any changes to the Drug Patent Act result in lower, not higher, drug prices.

Margaret Mitchell, President, Vancouver and District Public Housing Tenants Association.

I will read the next one to you, just to show you the concern of people. It states:

In light of the delay to make a decision on the Drug Patent Act please let us encourage you to reject Bill C-22 as a regressive step—

Senator Flynn: Make up your mind!

Senator Bonnell: It goes on:

—for our three million members leading to higher drug prices and serious loss of Canadian jobs.

Edith Johnston, Chairperson, Ontario Health Coalition, 1901 Yonge Street, Toronto, Ontario.

Let me read the next one to you. It states:

650 member Prince Edward Island Nurses Union strongly opposed to Bill C-22, An Act to amend the Patent Act (1969).

Urges Senate Committee and Senate of Canada to take necessary action to assure its defeat.

PEI Nurses Union President Sandra MacLean, Box 1284, Charlottetown, P.E.I.

Let me read the next one to you, Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: Of course I know what you are saying. Come on!

Senator Bonnell: It states:

The Special Committee of the Senate on Bill C-22 is to be congratulated on the hearings which allowed so many individuals and organizations to be heard on this important subject. We urge you, at second reading of this bill, to support amendments along the lines recommended by the Eastman Commission. We believe such changes would be in the best interest of, and supported by, the majority of Canadians.

Ross Chapman, Ottawa Representative, National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation.

• (1430)

Honourable senators, another telegram I received states:

It has come to our attention that your committee is about to report on its public hearings across the country. Our organization wishes to reiterate our sentiments expressed in our submission regarding our opposition to the proposed amendments. We hope that your committee has the conviction and the resolve to oppose any change in the patented act which permits drug companies the exclusive right to produce drugs for the stated period. There is no public support for such a change in this legislature and we urge your committee to oppose any shift in the present legislature.

Wm A Parsons President, Newfoundland and Labrador Federation Labour

A further telegram states:

Seniors citizens feel that it is imperative that we amend Bill C-22 in favour of generic drugs. With 2,300 members in our affiliation of PEI we strongly support the Senate committee in their efforts to revoke Bill C-22. We also feel that the Senate committee should not feel pressurized by government in this movement.

Respectfully submitted,

PEI Senior Citizens Federation

Per Mary Sutherland President, 30 Lincolnwood Dr., Charlottetown P.E.I.

Senator Flynn: Honourable senators, I think that what Senator Bonnell is doing now goes beyond the debate. We are dealing only with the report of the committee, which indicates that it will report the bill no later than August 10.

Senator Bonnell is now dealing with the bill itself, and he is contradicting himself all the time, which is not new. I suggest that reading these telegrams, which express views opposing the bill, is completely outside the issue at hand. It is unfair, and it is boring on top of that.

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Guay: For you it is.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, if Senator Flynn is insisting on the question of relevancy, the issue really is whether or not it is relevant for the chairman of a committee—while speaking to a report in which the committee has decided on a work schedule and work plan and a date by which it will complete its work and report to the Senate—to explain what it is that requires this additional work in terms of the concern in the country for its work.

I can understand Senator Flynn's point, but there is another side to it. It is not simply a matter of stating that there is nothing for the chairman of the committee to say in speaking relevantly to a report of this kind except comments that do not include representations that the committee has received. I do not really think it is quite as open and shut as Senator Flynn would like to think.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I appreciate Senator Flynn because he always keeps a little life in the place. However, I have received these telegrams all in support of the work that the committee is doing and encouraging the Senate to stand up and give sober second thought to this bill.

Nonetheless, I will take my honourable friend's advice, and not continue to read them into the record, and conclude my remarks, hoping that honourable senators will adopt the report today so that the committee can report not later than August 10.

I might point out, honourable senators, that our committee will continue its hard work and will report back not later than August 10.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, I rise more in sadness—

Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Frith: I never seem to have my violin just when I need it.

Senator Barootes: With your mellifluous voice you can sing a tune.

Senator Frith: I might hum in the background.

Senator Barootes: Honourable senators, my problem is this: We are doing in the Senate, virtually as a Committee of the Whole, the work that I thought was designed for this special committee. We are sitting in here discussing the pros and cons, listening to the submissions, and so on, that I thought our committee would be undertaking in its study. It is only through the benevolence of my friend, Dr. Bonnell, that we are able to hear all these reports again in this chamber.

I would have thought that some of the questions he has raised would be questions for the special committee. For example, I want to point out a couple of things about the urgency of this bill which have been raised over and over again both in committee and here. The question is asked: What is the urgency in regard to this bill? Honourable senators, I am going to read some comments taken from the Debates of the Senate whereby, going back to December 1986, it was suggested in this chamber by the leadership on this side that perhaps a pre-study of Bill C-22—obviously a politically controversial bill and one that was going to lead to considerable conjecture and presentations both to the House of Commons and to the Senate itself—would be appropriate. I am reading from page 1584 where Senator Murray stated:

On every occasion that we proposed a pre-study—and there was plenty of time available for such a pre-study—our proposal was rejected.

Later, Senator Murray stated:

... on numerous occasions ... we proposed to honourable senators opposite that those bills be pre-studied, and on each occasion our proposal was turned down. I think it is quite unreasonable.

The response from the Leader of the Opposition in the Senate was as follows:

In the light of the experience we had yesterday, the pre-study will become even more exceptional in the future. Take that as notice.

Honourable senators, it bothers me somewhat that we had six months in which we could have done all the thorough studies that are said to be needed, and, instead, we frittered away our time and waited until the end of May before the special committee undertook its task. I am not suggesting that that special committee has not been doing its job. It has been doing it diligently, and perhaps at times, as they say, it has been overdoing it.

We were assured by the chairman of the committee—and I do not say this in a critical manner—that he was only trying to expedite the work of the government by having the bill studied and reported. Indeed, we have not found that to be the case. Instead, we have seen what has been referred to as “delay, delay, delay.”

Honourable senators, I have no quarrel with that. It is the right of this chamber to delay if it feels that is the right thing to do. I have no objections to this committee re-chewing the whole situation again after the hundreds of hours and the hundreds of representations that have been made to us and to the committee of the House of Commons. I have no objection to that being done and, indeed, we have agreed to it. We have agreed to all these items that have been listed by my honourable friend, and I agree that we should be able to undertake further studies—not that I do not have rebuttals for some of those situations, which I have written down, but I dare bore you only with a couple.

One item that was mentioned was the delay that is encountered by drug companies in the Health Protection Branch as they test these drugs before they are licensed to be marketed. Indeed, this is true, it is a delay. But, he suggested, the delay is greater than that which occurs in other countries. The fact is that the Health Protection Branch of the Department of National Health and Welfare in Canada is no slower than those of most other countries and, in fact, in some instances is considerably more rapid. In recent years it has been faster. The four years that it now takes applies not just to generic drugs, as he would imply, but to all drugs, whether they come from a Canadian company, a British, a French, a Swiss or an American company. So, the delay is universal.

● (1440)

But there is something on the safety aspect that should also be said—and, as a doctor, a practising physician, Senator Bonnell should be aware of this—and that is the fact that we in this world have had some very nasty experiences with drugs that are brought on a little too hastily, with laboratory, animal and human tests that have not gone as far as they ought to have gone. Think of the thalidomide situation. This is why governments and health protection branches are somewhat careful before they allow the marketing of such drugs.

The chairman of the committee also raises the matter of the pipeline drugs being taken off the list. Indeed, they have not been taken off the list. To my knowledge there is only one drug that is available as a generic substitute that has been taken off the list. These are going through the normal procedure that is permissible under the previous act or will be permissible under Bill C-22 if it becomes law.

There are big concerns about dollars, and the honourable senator has quoted all sorts of organizations who fear—and I share their fear—that there may be a rise in the costs of some drugs in the future. As a practising physician, he, of course, is concerned about this. He relates this to health care costs. He relates this to the fact that the rising costs of drugs will affect health care programs in other areas—medical care, hospital care, and so on. We must point out that drug costs in the health field seldom exceed 5 per cent of the total cost. It is not a major item. It is of some concern, but it is not the major item. Hospital costs and doctors' costs are the two largest cost items. However, we agree that these studies should be undertaken—we have agreed and we shall proceed with them.

We request that senators look at the effects that may come about by a delay in the passage of this bill—the effects upon the immediate and long-term future of research and development. I refer to research and development being undertaken by scientists in Canada not only in the pharmacological field but also in the pharmacological departments of the universities, in our hospitals, in our medical colleges and elsewhere. It has been promised and undertaken that research and development in Canada will go from approximately 4 to 5 per cent up to 10 per cent of the gross expenditure of these pharmaceutical companies. I do not care whether they are Japanese, Chinese, Swiss, French or American—I want that kind of research and that sort of scientific work to be carried out by a cadre of scientists in Canada rather than having them educated here and being exported to these other countries. That has been the phenomenon we have been observing in Canada for many years, involving the best brains that we have ever educated. These things trouble me as well.

Let me go on—

Hon. Philippe Deane Gigantès: Would Senator Barootes permit a question?

Senator Barootes: In a moment, sir.

Senator Gigantès: In a moment.

Senator Barootes: I want to know what will happen to the $800 million that has already been pledged—and I use the word "pledged" in its proper meaning—towards the expansion of this kind of work, and I want us to look at what is going to happen to jobs in Canada. Are we going to export them to Pennsylvania and to Johns Hopkins, or are we going to keep some of these people here? Perhaps it would be wise for us to examine things from that viewpoint. Perhaps we could also study that aspect of the matter as well as the other subjects which Senator Bonnell has so excellently pointed out.

Today in our in camera meeting a decision was made and we have reported it. I want to tell honourable senators that in a conciliatory move—always being one who is willing to give, willing to be defeated, willing to look at the common good instead of what I can wreak out of a situation as a political gain—I, with the permission of some of my confrères, suggested that we study all of these things, even though some of them are ethereal, esoteric, academic and Cartesian in nature. Even though I think they are not the subject of major, relevant notice, I suggest that we do it all. Let us do everything, if that is the wish of senators, and even add a couple of subjects on the other side of the ledger, but, please, would it be possible for us to contract our work schedule? Would it be possible to work five days a week in this committee, morning, afternoon and evening if necessary? I am willing to do this for the good of this important and complex bill, but I would ask that we do it continuously and see whether in 60 sessions—60 sessions, that is what was suggested—we can go through until July 20 or 24 and report our findings. Whether we reject the bill, suggest amendments or report the bill without amendment, let us do it as people who are really interested in this subject and let us get on with it. Let us contract the time period. I am not suggesting that we omit any of the questions raised by honourable senators and by testimony given to us. I was quite willing to accept the day that has been accepted here of August 10, adding two to three weeks to the time needed. We are there to expedite, to assist the committee, not to obstruct or to delay. That is not our attitude. Let us get the work done.

All sorts of problems have been raised in committee and in this chamber. It bothers me to hear somebody say that although some 3,000 jobs have been promised, and I forget the total sum of money, I think it is well over $1 billion that has been pledged by the pharmaceutical industry for research and development, "there is no guarantee." Honourable senators, there is no guarantee that the end of the world won't come tomorrow—

An Hon. Senator: If you don't sit down, it might!

Senator Barootes: Who guarantees things like that? We must accept the word of somebody. The only things in this world that are guaranteed, to me, are taxes and death. As far as I am concerned, I am quite willing, as Senator Buckwold has mentioned on numerous occasions, to accept the word of rather worthy, well known international or national organizations who say they are prepared to do this. People who pledge that kind of an undertaking usually satisfy it.

As for compulsory licensing and the report of the ex-minister of British Columbia, let me say to my dear friend that nobody in this committee, in this house or in this bill has suggested that compulsory licensing, or, if you will, generic drugs, will be done away with. Compulsory licensing is going to continue, and generic drugs will continue to come on to the market—albeit there may be a short period of delay when this bill is first instituted. But there is no doubt, as that ex-minister of B.C. suggested, about our retaining compulsory licensing. Of course it is being retained.

● (1450)

Honourable senators, I am saying this not in a spirit of refuting or rejecting the statements; nor are my comments of an argumentative nature. I am simply saying that we have a job to do. Cannot we sit down and do it as quickly and as expeditiously as we can—get it done with, and then let us go home and enjoy at least part of the summer as a summer holiday?

Senator Gigantès: Honourable senators, Senator Barootes says that we should trust the word of those who promise that they will invest a certain amount.

Senator Haidasz: Never.

Senator Gigantès: I would like to remind honourable senators that the initial manufacturer of the CF-18 promised a certain level of investment and a certain level of contracts that were going to be given to the province of Quebec—and that level was never attained. The same thing happened with Bell-helicopter. They were talking of three times as many jobs as in reality it turned out they were going to produce.

All it takes for a firm to break its promises is to change its board or its ownership. There should be some provision in the law that would oblige those firms to keep their promises of increasing their expenditure for research from 5 per cent to 10 per cent. Let the 3,000 jobs form part of the legislation. All they have to do is change their board, or be bought out by someone else in a merger, and they do not keep their promise. What is there in the law that will enable us to impose some sanctions to ensure that a new board in one of those companies will keep its word?

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have listened with great patience to my honourable friend from our native province. I must admit that we have long winters there and we have nothing much to do except to listen to people like Senator Barootes go on and on, repeating themselves. It sort of helps pass the time of day.

An Hon. Senator: Careful! We'll send you Bonnell!

Senator Buckwold: That would be a pleasure. Senator Barootes started out very vigorously and gradually wound down, as he put most of us to sleep by giving us a long diatribe that we heard time and time again as we sat through the committee hearings. As a matter of fact, I would suggest to Senator Barootes that he does not have to come here any more. I will give his speech, because I know it by heart.

Let us look at the facts. We are now talking about the report of the committee on August 10—which, by the way, we have agreed to unanimously. First, I would like to know what is the urgency on the part of the government. Why has it threatened to bring back the House of Commons and have the members sit there while the Senate deals with this bill—at a cost of literally tens of thousands of dollars? I would like to ask what it costs to bring back the Senate today—and some honourable senators are complaining about the cost of the committee!

It comes down not to the timetable—because if, by coincidence, we had not entered the summer recess at this point, and Parliament went home for a well deserved rest, this debate would have gone on. One or two months would not make any difference. Drug companies will not walk out of Canada over those two months; 3,000 jobs will not be created, because it is a ten-year program; the $1.4 billion of research and development will wait. I am willing to take the word of the companies. I give them the benefit of the doubt. It is not really very much when we look at it over a ten-year period, keeping in mind that 50 per cent of that R&D is paid for by the Canadian government through income tax deductions.

So, when we look at the other side of the coin, what do we get? We get an immense burden on those people who can least afford to pay for those drugs so as to support more R&D, despite the fact that we were told by Eastman that it is not likely that we will have important R&D in this country. I have to add to the statement of my honourable colleague that R&D in Canada is not going to be any less. It was 4.5 per cent before 1969 and it is still 4.5 per cent of sales, because it is there mostly because of the law. Companies have to test certain drugs. They have to go through clinical testing and research. They are not going to pull out. I would like to see that expanded. As I have said before in this chamber, I would also like to see them increase that so-called 10 per cent to what they spend on entertainment and promotion and advertising—namely, according to Eastman, 21 per cent of their sales. If they did that, perhaps we might see some real results.

What I am really saying is that the government has made an issue of this particular bill, trying to use the Senate as a scapegoat—and that bothers me—that we are putting people out of work, that we are delaying the manufacture of new drugs, that suddenly the health of the world will be at ransom because the Senate is still in session trying to do its job.

What we are really looking at is a struggle of a government that is shaky and nervous, concerned about public opinion, and wanting to maintain its authority over Parliament. That is really what we are looking at in this whole debate. They say, "The Senate can't do that to us."

Senator Flynn: A Liberal Senate!

Senator Buckwold: "A Liberal Senate can't do that to us," when all we are doing is trying to maintain the constitutional responsibility which is given to us.

Senator Flynn: I don't believe that.

Senator Buckwold: You don't believe anything—that is by unanimous consent. So, I say to honourable senators, let our committee do its work. Let it go on—because, quite frankly, I think the government has had the biggest break that it has had in a long time, and it does not deserve it. If I had had my way on the committee—and my fellow members are aware of it—I would have brought in amendments long ago. This way the government at least has a fighting chance that maybe something will happen. I would have brought in amendments to one of the worst pieces of legislation that I have seen in a long time.

[Senator Barootes.]

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Guay: Right on!

Senator Buckwold: What I am saying is that what we are looking at is not the smokescreen that we read in the press, of factories pulling out of Canada, of the pharmaceutical people cancelling their plans, and that 3,000 jobs will be lost. That is nonsense. We know it is nonsense and you know it is nonsense. It is a long way down the road. On the other side of the coin, we do not hear what is going to happen to the generic industry, which is a rapidly growing industry, employing many people, with major capital expenditure—and prices, naturally, that are low.

While I was in Saskatchewan over the weekend I received a phone call. On July 1 our Conservative government in Saskatchewan eliminated its present plan for drug care—our pharmaceutical plan. It was a very generous plan. They have done that in order to save money. An individual telephoned me and said, "I really did not know how much drugs cost, because we paid only $3.95, whatever the prescription was, if it was an approved drug, and the government paid the rest." The provincial government has now changed that plan, and one has to pay for drugs up to $125. You then send in your receipts, if you can find them, and they will pay you 80 per cent. The individual who phoned me said to me, "I suddenly realized that the drug I was buying, which was a patent drug, cost $40 per prescription. I can't afford to pay $40. I found out that I could have got another drug at about $20 or $25, which was a generic drug, and I have now asked my doctor for that; but even now I have to pay $20 or $25." He said to me, "Please, go back to the Senate and beg them, plead with them"—as my colleague said earlier—"to hold down the price of drugs." These people are senior citizens, and they are the least able to afford these higher prices. This occurred right in Senator Barootes' area, which is going through an exercise in program slashing at this very moment and where the province still expresses concern about the health of its people. Yet, the provincial government is saying, "Support this bill, because it may bring in a small factory." That is the most shortsighted thinking that I have heard of by a province.

● (1500)

Before I sit down, may I refer to a gentleman whom I have honoured and respected for a long time, Senator Murray. I was not here on Friday when an attack was made—

Senator Murray: Tuesday.

Senator Guay: Tuesday.

Senator Buckwold: Was it Tuesday? Anyway, it was June 30. I had to leave early that day. I am referring to Hansard of June 30.

Senator Guay: He had not been in the chamber for a couple of days.

Senator Buckwold: When I read Hansard, I could not believe that a gentleman of the nature of Senator Murray would stoop to what I thought was one of the most scurrilous kinds of attack—

Senator Guay: Shame!

Senator Buckwold:—on a committee chairman, as was recorded in Debates of the Senate. He indicated that Senator Bonnell was involved in one of the most ignoble, petty and miserable acts because, according to the record, a legislative assistant was thrown off the bus. I do not know of anybody being thrown off the bus, and I really do not like having my chairman referred to in those terms. Nor do I like such statements as "His conduct of that committee was not such as to bring much credit on the Senate or on the committee or on himself."

Senator Bonnell has not said a word about these statements. That is the kind of gentleman he is, but I am not a gentleman, and I do not like to take those kind of quips. I really do not like it, and I think an apology is due to the fine person who is chairman of our committee and who, even in the words of Senator Barootes, did a very good job going across the country, working assiduously and trying to hear the points of view of citizens of this nation. I find the whole matter very disconcerting. To me it is almost like the snarling of a politician at bay when suddenly, I presume, colleagues in the cabinet are saying, "What's the matter, leader? Are you not able to control your Senate?" I do not think that it is the kind of thing that Senator Murray would be proud of. I am sure that it is not. I hope that an apology will be made in the spirit of this house to a committee chairman who has worked very hard—

Senator Flynn: He has done a very good job of stalling, you mean.

Senator Buckwold:—to bring in a committee report on a very important subject to the Senate.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I shall not delay the Senate more than 60 seconds, in response to the invitation of the Honourable Senator Buckwold, to say that what I had to say on Tuesday evening was stated not in any personal animus toward the chairman of that committee, because I bear neither him nor anyone else here any personal animus, but I take the strongest objection to the way in which the business of that committee was conducted under his chairmanship for the reasons I outlined in my speech on Tuesday evening.

Senator Guay: That only makes it worse.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

TRANSPORT AND COMMUNICATIONS

SEVENTH REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND ADOPTED

Hon. Léopold Langlois, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the following report:

Tuesday, July 7, 1987

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications has the honour to present its

SEVENTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred the Bills C-18, An Act respecting national transportation, and C-19, Motor Vehicle Transport Act 1986, reports that it believes it can accelerate its work so as to be able to report Bills C-18 and C-19 on Monday, August 10, 1987.

Respectfully submitted,

LÉOPOLD LANGLOIS

Chairman

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

Senator Langlois: Honourable senators, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(f), I move that the report be adopted now.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

BUSINESS OF THE SENATE

DISPOSITION OF BILLS C-18, C-19 AND C-22—INSTRUCTIONS TO COMMITTEES—ADJOURNMENT

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, under the rubric of Notices of Motions, I wish to inform the Senate that, pursuant to the deliberations of the Special Committee on Bill C-22 this morning and of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications, consultations were held between the two parties represented in the Senate. The undertaking that was given by the Opposition is to the effect that, on the understanding the committees will have reported on August 10, the bills involved would be completed in all their stages by the end of that week—that is to say, by 5 p.m. on Friday, August 14.

Senator Frith: What do you mean by “the Opposition”? I thought they were unanimous decisions.

Senator Murray: That was the proposal that was made and accepted. Accordingly, I move, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding any rule of the Senate:

That the reports of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications and of the Special Committee of the Senate on Bill C-22, undertaking to report Bills C-18 and C-19 and Bill C-22, respectively, to the Senate not later than August 10, 1987, and adopted by the Senate this day, constitute an instruction by the Senate to the said Committees to report accordingly;

That not later than 5:00 p.m. on Friday, August 14, 1987, every question necessary to dispose of the remaining stages of the Bills, shall be put forthwith and successively, without further debate; and

[Senator Langlois.]

That, notwithstanding Rule 45, when the Senate adjourns following the adoption of this Order, it shall stand adjourned until August 10, 1987.

Senator Guay: At 2 o'clock?

The Hon. the Speaker: Is leave granted, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it your pleasure, honourable senators, to adopt the motion?

• (1510)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I will not delay the proceedings of the Senate for very long by my comments. I want to reiterate what Senator Murray has stated, namely, that this motion, which I support, embodies a proposal which I made earlier in the day to Senator Murray and which he accepted. As was pointed out also by Senator Murray, this motion is made possible by the reports from the committees, which we have now adopted and which were adopted in the committees unanimously. We have, therefore, concluded what might have been a disagreeable episode with an accommodation that has met the requirements, certainly, of the Senate and of the government.

I was struck by one sentence in the letter sent by the Honourable John A. Fraser, Speaker of the House of Commons, to the Deputy Prime Minister. The sentence which caught my attention is as follows:

I hope that further negotiations will result in an agreement which satisfies the constitutional requirements of Senate consideration of the bills in question and the Government's concern that it is in the public interest to proceed without undue delay.

Certainly, I was struck by the emphasis which the Speaker of the House of Commons put on the constitutional requirements of Senate consideration of the bills in question. I believe that is a helpful comment to be made with respect to the Senate. It certainly underlines the constitutional role of the Senate.

Also, I accept, of course, the additional comment made by the Honourable John Fraser, namely, that the government does have a responsibility to proceed with its legislative program. Certainly, it was never my intention, nor was it the intention of the Senate itself, to disregard the requirements of the government to proceed without undue delay.

Honourable senators, I will not proceed further, because we are concluding in a spirit of accommodation, except to say that the Senate itself has unanimously established in this instance its own legislative timetable, and I think that is important. I also want to add that the Senate itself has underlined the legitimacy of its role in the legislative process.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator MacEachen: I believe that that is important, and that we have concluded altogether—and unanimously—a timetable which is our timetable and which I hope will be noticed in the country, in the press and in the councils of the government.

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, if I may, I would point out two things. First, the August 10 date for reporting does not imply that the committees must continue sitting until August 10. They can complete their work earlier if the committees so wish.

Second, the House of Commons will have to be recalled either to deal with amendments or, in any event, with Royal Assent. Perhaps in our consideration on third reading of these bills we might bear in mind that possibility and avoid that process taking place on a Saturday or on a weekend in Ottawa. I am sure honourable senators will extend to the House of Commons every consideration.

Motion agreed to.

LEGAL AND CONSTITUTIONAL AFFAIRS

COMMITTEE AUTHORIZED TO STUDY DOCUMENT ENTITLED "IMPLEMENTATION OF THE 1985 CHANGES TO THE INDIAN ACT"

Hon. Joan Neiman, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs, with leave of the Senate and notwithstanding rule 45(1)(e), moved:

That the Standing Senate Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs be authorized to examine and report upon the document entitled: Implementation of the 1985 Changes to the Indian Act, tabled in the Senate on 29th June, 1987 (Sessional Paper No. 332-452).

Motion agreed to.

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

DELAYED ANSWERS TO ORAL QUESTIONS

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have delayed answers to the following questions: On March 10, 1987, a question by the Honourable Sidney L. Buckwold regarding Canada-United States relations; on April 2, 1987, by the Honourable Allan J. MacEachen regarding the Canada-France Fisheries and Boundaries Dispute; and on June 29, 1987, by the Honourable Lorna Marsden regarding Tax Reform—White Paper.

CANADA-FRANCE FISHERIES AND BOUNDARIES DISPUTE

SENATE REPRESENTATION AT NEGOTIATIONS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): I wonder if Senator Phillips would read the answer on the Canada-France fisheries dispute.

Senator Phillips: Certainly.

Two government members of the House of Commons were included as observers at the fisheries negotiations between Canada and France because of the very special situation. Participation was broadened to ensure that representatives of the fishing interests, both the fishermen and the industry, as well as Members of Parliament who have shown an unusual interest in the question were included.

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

CANADIAN STANCE ON ACID RAIN—COMMENTS BY U.S. INTERIOR SECRETARY

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I wonder whether Senator Phillips would read the response to the question I asked. I presume any question I would ask on U.S.-Canada relations would relate to potash, if I am correct.

Senator Phillips: The answer to Senator Buckwold's question is approximately a page in length and relates to Canada-United States Relations—Canadian Stance on Acid Rain.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, the problem is that, according to the order we just accepted, we will not be back in this chamber until August. Recently we have established the principle of having these answers appear in the Debates of the Senate and then the senator concerned can read it and raise the matter again the next day if he wishes. However, the next day in this case is many days hence, so perhaps Senator Phillips would read all of the answers. He has read one of them; perhaps he would read the other two, even the answer to Senator Marsden's question, since she is not here right now, in case that gives rise to some interest by senators who are present.

Senator Phillips: I will be happy to read the reply to Senator Buckwold's question.

Senator Buckwold: I must say that I do not recall asking any question on acid rain.

Senator Frith: That is what happens when it takes so long to get an answer.

Senator Buckwold: It may be that it will interest someone else, and I am glad to get the publicity.

Senator Phillips: On the other hand, if you have forgotten about it, I am sure it can wait until August.

Senator Frith: But other senators might be interested in it. Perhaps you will read it.

Senator Phillips: Very well, I will read it.

The U.S. does not have the principle of Cabinet solidarity, therefore, Cabinet members often give opinions in public that are only individual opinions, not those of the Administration as a whole. Canada will take its lead from President Reagan on acid rain.

• (1520)

We welcome the announcement made by the President on March 18, confirming a commitment of $2.5 billion over five years to fund innovative emission control projects and establishing an advisory panel, including Canadian participation, to advise the Secretary of Energy on funding and selection of those projects. In addition, the Presidential Task Force will review federal and state economic and regulatory programs to identify opportunities for addressing environmental concerns under existing laws.

What the Prime Minister has proposed to President Reagan is a bilateral accord with specific targets and specific schedules to reduce the transboundary flow of sulphur dioxide emissions into eastern Canada by 2 million tonnes.

During the recent Summit, President Reagan acknowledged, for the first time, in one of his sessions with the Prime Minister, that 50 per cent of the acid rain falling in Canada originates in the U.S. President Reagan said in his address in the other place that "The Prime Minister and I agreed to consider the Prime Minister's proposal for a bilateral accord on acid rain, building on the tradition of agreements to control pollution of our shared international waters".

It was agreed between the two countries that we would begin immediately to discuss the possibility of a bilateral accord that would address the question of specific acid rain causing emission reductions on both sides of the border. We are going to proceed with dispatch and follow whatever progress is possible between two countries in the spirit of co-operation.

Honourable senators, I hope that reply revives the memory of Senator Buckwold.

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: May I ask a supplementary question as a result of that reply? Is it not true that the United States Congress already reduced the $2.5 billion, which is the amount the reply refers to President Reagan as having mentioned, to something like $300 million?

Senator Phillips: I do not have access to the American budget, but I will make inquiries for the honourable senator.

TAX REFORM

WHITE PAPER—TWENTY CONSULTANTS—FEMALE REPRESENTATION

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, I have a delayed answer to a question raised in the Senate on June 29, 1987, by the Honourable Lorna Marsden, regarding Tax Reform—White Paper—Twenty Consultants—Female Representation.

Hon. Royce Frith (Deputy Leader of the Opposition): Can we hear the answer to Senator Marsden's question, please?

Senator Phillips: Senator Marsden is correct—chalk one mark up for her!

One of the members of the Tax Reform Income Tax Panel was Irene David of Clarkson Gordon. Eleanore Richardson, the other name mentioned by Senator Marsden, is frequently in contact with the Department of Finance, however, she was not a member of either of the Tax Reform Panels.

[Senator Phillips.]

SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON SUBJECT MATTER OF BILL C-22

CONSIDERATION OF THIRD REPORT—DEBATE CONTINUED

On the Order:

Resuming the debate on the consideration of the Third Report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Subject Matter of Bill C-22, An Act to amend the Patent Act and to provide for certain matters in relation thereto, tabled in the Senate on 23 June, 1987.—(Honourable Senator Bonnell).

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, some days ago I adjourned the debate on Bill C-22. Perhaps we should now proceed with that debate to get the item off the order paper. I had hoped that the Leader of the Government in the Senate might have stayed in his seat so that I could answer some of his questions of Tuesday last, when he made some remarks in my absence which did not sound becoming, particularly from the Leader of the Government, a man whom I respected; a man who I thought was a maritimer; a man who I thought had feelings for people; a man who I thought understood the needs of consumers; a man who I thought had respect for senior citizens; a man who I thought felt for the aged, the disabled and the crippled; a man who I thought was really concerned about the people of Canada; a man who I thought was concerned about Parliament; a man who I thought was concerned about the procedures of the Senate and its committees; a man who I thought had some respect for his fellow man; and a man who I thought had respect for his fellow parliamentarians. Since he is not present today, I will not reply in kind. I will not say anything bad about him, because it does not behoove me to condemn anyone. However, I must say that I found out that he did not quite merit the respect that I always thought was his due.

Let me say to you, honourable senators—and you will notice that I did not rise on a question of privilege, because I have no desire to debate questions of privilege about my character or about his character; whether I am ignoble, or whether I merit other terms that might be used by some people—that I have put it all down to Senator Murray's being under a great deal of pressure from the government of the day—a great deal of pressure which he is not used to; a great deal of pressure which, as a member who was never elected to a house to represent the people, as such, he has never had to take in the pros and cons of debate. Rather, he has been working with government in premiers' offices and as an adviser to leaders—outside the actual elected body—and he is perhaps not particularly used to the fray of political in-fighting back and forth. So, I am prepared to accept without any rancour the things that he has said about me, if it does his soul good to say those things about a fellow man. But let me correct for the record some of the things that he said and put on the record the other day.

I hope that the record is correct. He said:

The Special Committee of the Senate was set up, by the way, with instructions to report by a certain date. It was a bit late,—

Let me take that statement first, honourable senators. The Special Committee of the Senate was set up, but there was no instruction given by the Senate that we had to report by any special date. However, in committee the committee decided that we should try to report by June 16. That was a committee decision, not an instruction of the Senate, as such. I am aware that many such motions of the Senate contain an instruction to report by a certain day. I, as the chairman of that committee, put forward that view, namely, that we should try to report by June 16. But if you remember, honourable senators, when I had the ads ready to publish respecting our travel to the eastern part of this great country of ours, I was delayed because of questions about my budget raised by my good friend from Prince Edward Island. This was not because he was against the committee's going to the great province of Prince Edward Island. In fact, he was there himself. He, as Leader of the Government, had a job to do that day, and he did his job well. I do not bear any grudge against him for that. He adjourned that debate for a week and that held up the budget. Honourable senators, that meant that I had to cancel my hotel reservations, and we had to postpone putting advertisements in the papers for another week. It slowed us down so that we could not hold all the hearings we wanted to in a short period of time.

• (1530)

In order to assist, the committee did not travel to Whitehorse and Yellowknife. We heard the representatives from the territories in Victoria and in Edmonton. We did this to try, to the best of our ability as a committee, to report back to the Senate as close as possible to June 16.

Those of you who are here will remember that on June 16 I did bring in a progress report of the committee. I brought in the final report the following week, on June 23.

Honourable senators, just to keep the record straight, the assertion that the Special Senate Committee was set up with instructions to report by a certain date is not correct. That committee had no instructions from the Senate to report by a certain date.

Honourable senators, on June 30, in the Senate chamber, the Leader of the Government stated:

I do not wish to be controversial at this point, but I do want to say that in my humble opinion the work of that committee did not represent many of the finer hours of the Senate. There was an enormous amount of repetition and time-wasting and an enormous amount of taxpayers' money spent in an exercise which, frankly, has not produced very much.

Honourable senators, as chairman of that committee, which worked very hard, let me tell you that in almost every city we went to we heard nothing but praise for our committee. We were told by many of our witnesses that our committee was to be congratulated on coming to hear the concerns of the provinces, and that our committee had given them a much better hearing than they had ever been given by the House of Commons. Many of the witnesses said that they could not be heard by the House of Commons, and they were pleased that we had taken the time to give them an opportunity to be heard. If you had travelled with us, honourable senators, you would have been proud of your senators on that committee—of both political persuasions—in the way that they conducted themselves, in the way they represented the Senate, and in the way they listened to the concerns of the people. They listened to consumers' groups, representatives of industry and universities, researchers and others. I am quite sure that if other committees did as much good work as that committee did across the country, we, as senators, could be proud of our committees.

The Leader of the Government went on to state:

Of course, they could not find time to go to Montreal, where there is some economic interest in this bill and in seeing this bill passed. The committee did, however, get to Quebec City, where it heard from the Government of Quebec, represented by the Minister of Industry and Commerce . . .

Honourable senators, it is quite correct that we did not go to Montreal, but the reason we did not go to Montreal is because we did not go anywhere except to the capital city of each province. Apparently, we are condemned by the Leader of the Government because we did not go to Vancouver, Calgary or Montreal. Honourable senators, if we had gone to cities other than the capital cities where the government of the province and the government of the region was located then why wouldn't we have gone to Saskatoon, Summerside or Victoria, Prince Edward Island? Why wouldn't we have gone to Moncton, Sydney, Corner Brook or Come-By-Chance? Honourable senators, the committee, not I, made the decision to go to the capital cities of the provinces, and that is why we did not go to Montreal, Vancouver, Calgary, Saskatoon or some of the other cities.

Senator Guay: You have forgotten Brandon!

Senator Bonnell: To condemn our committee, which worked diligently and prepared an extensive report, because it did not go to some of the cities of Canada I do not think was a fair judgment by the Leader of the Government. It is unfair to say that we did not do justice to our mandate and that we should not be proud of our committee.

We heard from the Government of Quebec in Quebec City. It is my understanding that the minister of the Quebec government had a press conference somewhere else in town, and that someone on his behalf presented the committee with a brief which was tabled by our committee.

An Hon. Senator: Shame!

Senator Bonnell: The Leader of the Government went on to state:

Honourable senators, I should mention that it was under considerable duress that the committee agreed to hear La Fédération de l'Âge d'Or, which is the largest senior citizens organization in Quebec with 250,000 members—

Let me say that that organization was given an opportunity to appear, but their representatives did not show up.

Senator Phillips: No confidence.

Senator Bonnell: I do not know why they did not appear, but they did not. It was not because they did not have an opportunity, they had that, but they did not take it.

The Leader of the Government went on to state:

I am sorry that the chairman of the committee is not present to hear me, because I would have liked to have said this in his presence. His conduct of that committee was not such as to bring much credit on the Senate, on the committee or on himself. The deck was stacked from the beginning, in terms of witnesses. The committee side-stepped Montreal, Calgary and Vancouver, where it might possibly have heard some support for the bill.

Honourable senators, I am just a little old Prince Edward Island medical doctor, and I do not speak French; I do not understand it very well; and I speak better Gaelic. When the committee arrived in La Belle Province of Quebec, I turned the chairmanship over to my good friend and colleague, Senator Cogger. Therefore, if Senator Murray is finding fault in terms of the chairmanship in the province of Quebec, he had better find that fault with his own Senator Cogger.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Senator Frith: We support you, Senator Cogger, not the criticism.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I never asked a question of a witness in the province of Quebec, I merely welcomed them and turned the gavel over to my colleague. I thought he did a wonderful job.

Senator Guay: The best choice!

Senator Bonnell: He gave all of the witnesses from the province of Quebec an opportunity to be heard. On this occasion the Leader of the Government condemned the wrong man.

Some Hon. Senators: Shame!

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Government said that the deck was stacked from the beginning in terms of witnesses. I would point out that we heard each and every group that wanted to appear before us except for a few who were heard by the House of Commons committee.

Yes, I admit that we heard consumers in Ottawa, we heard consumers in Alberta and we heard consumers in Prince Edward Island. Let me tell honourable senators that these consumers are citizens of this country and they are citizens who are concerned about this bill. These consumers are the people that we went out to hear. It was the people of Canada that we went out to hear in the first place. If I said to those consumers, "I'm sorry, the Leader of the Government in the Senate has said that since we heard from your main office in Ottawa, we do not have to hear from the branch office in Prince Edward Island," I would have to leave the province. I am telling senators that these people are all consumers and that they all have a vote. They will know which way to vote next time if they are scratched off as not meriting to be heard by this government. Are they not to be heard just because they come from Alberta or just because they come from British Columbia? When they came from Quebec, they could come here and say, "Good-bye, Charlie Brown," and they were listened to.

• (1540)

Let me tell honourable senators that I have always had a reputation of listening to the concerns of people. All my life I have been serving the public one way or another. I have never been one of those who turned down senior citizens, the aged, the infirm or otherwise. That is why we heard them all in different areas. The people of Alberta could not come to Ottawa, so we went there. Why would we not hear them? But the Leader of the Government thinks that we should not have heard them. I am glad that he is not looking for any support in Alberta, Prince Edward Island or some of these other places.

Honourable senators, I quote again the Leader of the Government, who went on to say:

... the chairman, Senator Bonnell, in one of the most ignoble and petty and miserable acts I have ever heard of, threw the legislative assistant off the committee's bus and would not allow her to travel with the committee.

Let me tell honourable senators that I have never thrown anybody off any bus, car, bicycle, truck or wagon. That statement is absolutely false. Let me say to honourable senators further that the committees' branch hired a bus for the senators and the staff to go from the airport to the committee meetings. On several occasions when we got on the bus at the airports, the general public thought that it was the limousine bus service to the hotel and came aboard. We would ask them whether they were with the committee, and they, in turn, would realize they had the wrong bus and would leave. I love them—I love people. But when it came to the minister's legislative assistant, she travelled on the bus on many occasions. She never asked me if she could, but she did. I never told her she couldn't, but I did suggest, since Senator Phillips was so concerned about the cost and about spending the people's money—

Some Hon. Senators: Oh! Oh!

Senator Bonnell: —that if the minister's staff wanted to travel with us, that was fine, but maybe they should pay their share of the travel expenses.

Senator Guay: Right on!

Senator Bonnell: There was nobody removed from the bus. That statement, again, is not fact.

Senator Murray went on to say:

His behaviour as chairman of that committee was shameful, and I will repeat it to his face.

Honourable senators, I have been chairman of many committees and I would venture to say that there has been no fairer, no more unbiased chairman than I have been in my 37 years as a parliamentarian. I say to honourable senators that that was not a seemly remark to be made by someone who I thought was my friend and colleague. But I put his reaction and his statements down to pressure from the government, because the government leader was partially unable to get action where the government thought he should. As a result, he got carried away by his emotions and said things that need not have been said, that should not have been said. I am not going to ask him to apologize or retract, I am just going to let him take it with him. I am quite sure that as time goes on he will understand that that is not the way to act among his confrères in this chamber.

Senator Guay: Especially when they are not here.

Senator Flynn: You are out of order.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, if Senator Flynn would either get up and make a speech or sit down and be quiet, I could continue with my speech.

Senator Flynn: You are still out of order. You don't understand what is relevant.

Senator Bonnell: I understand what is relevant. If you would just sit still and listen for a while, you would understand that I am talking about what is in this report, what is in the report of Hansard, what is in Bill C-22, and what the leader of your party said here in my absence. Many statements made by him were not founded on fact.

Honourable senators, in concluding my remarks, I would like to mention some of the concerns that we heard expressed by our witnesses. I think these concerns are important enough to have justified our travels so that we might bring them back to parliamentarians. The National Pensioners and Senior Citizens Federation of Canada stated:

It is the belief that many seniors will, in the future if the bill becomes law, have to pay much higher prices for all new drugs.

The Royal Canadian Legion, one of the most respected organizations in this country, said:

All consumers, including the elderly, the sick and the poor, are bound to suffer financially from the enactment of Bill C-22.

The Manitoba Anti-Poverty Organization stated:

If Bill C-22 is implemented and the drug prices rise, the number of people who will forego necessary medication in favour of other necessities will increase. When a single mother is confronted with the decision of either buying food for her young or medication for herself, the prescription often goes unfilled. Our health care system was founded on the principles of accessibility and universality and these principles should not be negotiated away in favour of higher profits for multinational drug companies.

Hon. Michel Cogger: Would Senator Bonnell entertain a question?

Senator Bonnell: Certainly.

● (1550)

Senator Cogger: Honourable senators, it seems to me that I have lived in Senator Bonnell's back pocket for the past three months. I did indeed travel with him to all those great places; but how is it, senator, that when you report back to this house there never appears to be one single solitary soul supporting the legislation? I was there and I heard it. I do not question the quotes that you have offered. I am not suggesting that those people have not been heard. I would remind the honourable senator of an incident. Do you recall, senator, when in Halifax, hearing from a young lady who, I believe, represented the Cystic Fibrosis Foundation? She gave one of the most moving testimonies that I believe the committee heard. She implored the Senate to pass the legislation promptly, because, as she pointed out to the committee, the only hope she had of her two children living beyond the age of 20 was to have more research and development and better drugs. It was a most moving testimony. What about the dozens of researchers, pharmacists, pharmacologists, doctors, university groups and others? How come that we do not hear about them?

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, my friend is correct.

Senator Flynn: About time!

Senator Bonnell: If you had only waited long enough. I am coming to that.

Senator Flynn: It will be the first time.

Senator Bonnell: He got there a little ahead of me. What he said is true. That little girl did come to Halifax and she did tell us about the Cystic Fibrosis Foundation. But she spoke alone. The people I am talking about are those who represented hundreds of thousands of people, groups and organizations.

We heard also from the Consumers Association of Canada, which represents a lot of people. They said that the 1969 amendments had been a success, and the Canadian Consumers Association would prefer to see no change, no increase in drug prices. It said:

The more we check, the more we find Bill C-22 harms consumers.

In Manitoba the Society for Seniors stated:

It is imperative that drugs in Canada continue to be subject to a market in which competition keeps prices reasonable. We are concerned that the health services will be jeopardized and in future will ensure multinational companies excessive profits. Generic drugs have saved Canadians millions of dollars and have been part of a sound plan to keep health costs from skyrocketing.

Let me say further that when we went to Quebec City the support for the bill was overwhelming.

Senator Flynn: I was there.

Senator Bonnell: There was strong support except for the consumers organization. In Edmonton we had support from the universities and researchers—the same as in Saskatchewan. In Halifax, Nova Scotia, we heard from professors who supported the bill as well as from those in research. In Fredericton, New Brunswick, we heard from pharmacists who supported the bill. We heard from many individuals who supported the bill. I believe that most of those who supported the bill did so for one good reason: they wanted what they thought would be more research in Canada; and I believe that the committee, as a whole, felt they had a good viewpoint. I did not hear one of our committee members find any fault with what those witnesses, who were supporting the bill because of research, were saying. Members of the committee said that they, too, supported the research and that there should be more research done in Canada. I believe that all members of the committee, regardless of their political persuasion, supported that view.

Yes, there is that concern, but very few of the people who were involved with research showed their concern about the effect on drug prices. I would not say that they were not concerned, but they did not show their concern so much about the increase in the price of drugs.

Senator Flynn: The buck came very soon.

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, I received a brief from the Province of New Brunswick containing some recommendations, which I would like to place on the record. The Province of New Brunswick suggests, first, that the period of exclusivity granted should not exceed four or five years; second, that the patent protection should be linked to a provision requiring Canadian sources of active ingredients; third, that the Price Review Board have no jurisdictional power over generic drugs. This should be addressed. Generic manufacturers may attempt to compensate for lost future anticipated revenue due to delayed entry of new generic products by increasing prices substantially; fourth, the amendments will result in higher costs to provincial drug plans. The provision of compensation to the provinces is inadequate, and no provision is made to compensate after four years; five, there should be a pricing policy for the multinationals' innovative drugs that do not constitute therapeutic advances—commonly known as "me too" drugs—that is 20 per cent below the originator's product.

There is one final comment which may be of interest. The American Association of Retired Persons was invited to make a presentation before the Waxman Subcommittee on Health and the Environment hearings on drug prices held in Washington, D.C., on April 21, 1987. The AARP, the American Association of Retired Persons, is a membership organization representing 25 million Americans aged 50 and over. Reading from the summary of the presentations and questions, it says:

It was recommended that the United States adopt the Canadian compulsory licensing model as a market-oriented solution to the lack of competition and that medicare be available to more people.

[Senator Bonnell.]

It was also proposed that medicare be expanded to include prescription drugs in order to accomplish coverage similar to the Canadian system.

That is from an organization representing 25 million Americans.

Honourable senators, I know that you do not want to hear what has happened, but I have all these telegrams from people across Canada supporting this committee of the Senate and telling me what a great job the committee did, despite the fact that the Leader of the Government said that we did not add any honour to ourselves or to the Senate. I have been here now for 16 years, and there has never been a piece of legislation that I know of that has come before this august body that has brought so many letters and telegrams saying, "Keep up the good work. You are our last hope. We depend on you." This is where the Senate is needed and required at a time when we have a large majority of one party in the House of Commons. This is where a sound second chamber is needed, one that represents the regions and the provinces, one that can listen to their concerns and, in turn, can make its own voice heard.

• (1600)

I would like to read all these telegrams, but maybe I can, just for the record, read where they are from and leave out the good things or bad things that they have said. They are all in favour of what we are doing, what the Senate is doing.

Senator Flynn: What are you doing?

Senator Bonnell: We are giving them an opportunity to be heard.

Senator Flynn: Ha!

Senator Bonnell: Giving them an opportunity to be heard, that is what we are doing.

Senator Flynn: You are a joker.

Senator Bonnell: We travelled across this country and we gave the people of Canada an opportunity to be heard in their regions.

Honourable senators, Senator Flynn says that we are joking. Let me tell you that a very important process has been started. It is something that we should do more often when it comes to matters that affect the regions or the provinces. I think we should stand up stronger when it comes to legislation or other government action that affects the regions of this country. What is happening in many cases is that the weaker parts of the country are becoming weaker and the stronger parts are becoming stronger. So, if we do not use our united strength here, as representatives of the regions, and if we do not give them an opportunity, at least, to be heard, then I do not think we are carrying out our mandate of sober second thought in representing the regions of this country.

Senator Flynn: Sober second thought! You have been dead set against this bill since—

Senator Bonnell: I have a telegram here from Robert White, President of the Canadian Auto Workers Union. It says, in part, "I urge you to block the passage of Bill C-22—." Here is one from Sally Hall on behalf of the Consumers' Association of Canada. She says something to the effect of "congratulations on your excellent work here." Here is another one from Theodora Carroll Foster representing EDPRA Consulting Inc.

Senator Phillips: You should have read it before—

Senator Bonnell: I did not read it before.

Senator Flynn: He only reads the ones that suit him.

Senator Bonnell: She said in her telegram:

We hope that when submitting your report to the Senate you will convey to the other members of the Senate our opposition to proposed changes in the Patent Act—

Here is one signed by Katherine Shaw.

Senator Macquarrie: What did Ms. Foster say?

Senator Bonnell: Here is one from Sandra Drake, Member, Board of Directors, The Council of Canadians, and it is against this bill. Here is one from Stan Sugarbroad, President, Ontario Coalition of Senior Citizens Organizations, and representing over 300,000 senior citizens of Ontario.

Senator Flynn: If you add them all up, you will probably find that it is more than the population of Canada.

Senator Bonnell: There is one here from Luciano Calenti, Chairman, Canadian Drug Manufacturers' Association. There is one here from Canadian Churches for Global Justice. Here is one from Leslie Dan, President, Novopharm Ltd.

Senator Barootes: Is he for or against it?

Senator Bonnell: The telegram reads:

We sincerely believe that Bill C-22 in its current form will not achieve significant industrial benefits for Canada and further that it will be harmful to consumers.

Senator Barootes: Does he have a vested interest?

Senator Bonnell: He did not say whether he did or did not. I simply read his name out.

I have one here from William J. Mullen, National Secretary Treasurer, Federal Superannuates National Association. I have one here from Fred Hannington, Dominion Secretary, Royal Canadian Legion. I have one here from W. Hastings, Vancouver, President, Consumers Association of Canada, B.C. branch. This one is from Wayne Easter, President, National Farmers Union.

Senator Phillips: It costs a lot for those telegrams.

Senator Bonnell: I know it does. They spent a lot of money. Here is one from Bernard C. Sherman, President of Apotex. Here is one from Ross Chapman, National Pensioners and Senior Citizens. This one is from Marguerite Chown. Let me read what she had to say to honourable senators so you will know what we heard throughout the country:

On behalf of the Manitoba Society of Seniors Inc. I wish, again, to thank you and your fellow members of the Special Committee of the Senate for the opportunity on June 5, 1987 to present our brief in protest against Bill C-22.

We appreciate, most sincerely, the courtesy and graciousness with which we were received and the generous amount of time which we were allowed. We are indebted to you because we feel that we have benefitted from your implementations of the democratic process which is giving Canadian citizens a voice in this controversial matter.

We would like to express our concern about the ill-considered dispatch by which Bill C-22 was disposed of in the House of Commons.

That is just one piece of evidence on some of the things we heard. I have more telegrams here, and I could go on.

However, I would like to say a few words about the prices of these drugs. I have here some statistics on the different prices of drugs which were presented to our committee. For example, for the drug Naproxen in 250 milligram capsules, the Canadian generic drug costs $13, the Canadian brand name costs $30 and the U.S. brand name costs $55.20. One hundred tablets of the 4 milligram size of Salbutamol in the generic form costs $8.80, the Canadian brand name costs $13.95, and the U.S. brand name costs $29.31. Those statistics show that because of competition in Canada, even the innovative drugs are cheaper. We have statistics on other drugs such as Cimetidine. One hundred of 200 milligram tablets cost $6.30 for the generic product, $27.54 for the Canadian brand name and $50.87 for the U.S. brand name. Honourable senators, these statistics show the price differential which the provincial governments of Canada are worried about.

● (1610)

Another typical example is a drug called Zantac, which is one of the largest-selling prescription drugs in Canada today. Its sales are around $50 million. There is a generic drug available at the present time called Ranitidine, which is now being prescribed. However, because Ranitidine came on the market since June of 1986, if Bill C-22 passes, this drug will have to be removed from the market. The result of that one drug alone being taken off the market will cost the Province of New Brunswick $1.6 million.

There is another group of drugs, which are called "pipeline drugs", which should come on the market soon. However, because of this legislation, they will be held up for several years. They are drugs such as Tenormin, Trandate, Anaprox, Ceclor, Adalat, Cardizem, Xanax, and others. Those are all drugs that have been used fairly exclusively by a great many patients in Canada.

There is another list of approximately 30 possible generic drugs available such as Halcion, Corgard, Clinoril, Viskin, Viskazide, Vibramycin, Voltaren, Orudis, Canesten, Minipress, Sinequin, Monistat, Dalacin C, Beclovent, Beconase, Timoptic, Blocadren, Restoril, and many more.

Honourable senators, one of the things that we heard several times as we travelled around the country appeared also in a letter from Mr. Joseph Ivan, 9 Garrick Road, Scarborough, Ontario. Mr. Ivan apparently wrote to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and said:

I am very disgusted to read in the newspaper that you have THREATENED the Senate "with being in jeopardy" if they veto or delay this so called DRUG LEGISLATION.

We have heard different comments made by different witnesses regarding the disrespect that the minister had for the Senate when he made that statement. However, the minister indicated that he did not mean what he said, and that he had said it with tongue in cheek. Honourable senators, I am inclined to believe the minister when he says that he did not really mean what he said.

Honourable senators, with these few remarks on my part, I move the adoption of this report.

[Translation]

Hon. Jacques Flynn: Honourable senators, I simply want to say that in all my twenty-five years here in the Senate, I have never seen such abuse of position by a committee chairman.

The bill, as we know, would normally have been referred to the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce. However, the Opposition was afraid of the committee's objectivity, and people were selected who were known to be opposed to the bill. We could not have found anyone more determined in this respect than Senator Bonnell, who had been tabling petition upon petition.

Senator Guay: That is not true.

Senator Flynn: Not true? You don't know what you're saying, Senator Guay. Petitions against this bill were tabled here in this chamber by Senator Bonnell. You know that perfectly well. You should have the decency—

Senator Guay: You cannot prejudge the members of the committee, even if you are Senator Flynn.

Senator Flynn: I am talking about Senator Bonnell. He was opposed to the bill to start with, and that is why he was chosen. Today, he is tabling reports on behalf of the committee, reports that are biased, prejudiced and totally lacking in objectivity. That Senator Bonnell should act objectively is absolutely irreconcilable with the position he has taken and the comments he has been making these many months. If he is consistent, he cannot support this legislation. He has to vote against it, instead of pretending to want to consider this bill. He is abusing his position. A person who lacks objectivity to that degree should not accept the duties of chairman of the committee. At this stage, Senator Bonnell should simply resign.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

[English]

Hon. Orville H. Phillips: Honourable senators, before the debate is adjourned, Senator Bonnell made reference to the cost of transporting the legislative assistant to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I would like to advise Senator Bonnell that if he, as chairman of the Special Committee on Bill C-22, were to advise the minister of the additional cost, the minister would be happy to pay the bus transportation for that person, including the unfortunate occasion when Senator Bonnell asked the young lady to leave the bus.

[Senator Bonnell.]

Senator Bonnell: Honourable senators, on a point of order, I never asked the young lady to leave the bus. That is not correct.

Hon. Efstathios William Barootes: Honourable senators, before the debate is adjourned, I rise to point out a couple of things that I know my honourable friend, Senator Bonnell, would not want to remain on the record, since they are incorrect or inaccurate. The young lady to whom he referred earlier as a secretary to the minister is, in fact, the minister's legislative assistant. Perhaps Senator Bonnell would like to have that corrected for the record.

I do want to point out that it was one of the officials of our committee who requested that the lady leave the bus, but I believe that she was under instruction from the chairman to do so, and perhaps Senator Bonnell could clarify that for us.

I also want to point out, in the matter of the numerous witnesses to whom Senator Bonnell made reference, that the Special Committee on Bill C-22 heard 130 witnesses in total. Eighty of those witnesses were opposed to the bill in its present form and 50 were supportive. Of the 80 who were against the bill, 32 of those were organizations which had spoken centrally, and then repeated their views at hearings in different provincial capitals. I will not mention them, because Senator Bonnell has brought them to your attention. However, I do want to emphasize that 32 of those 80 who were opposed to the bill were duplications or provincial chapters of federal organizations.

I would also like the record to show that 19 of the people we heard were duplications of national organizations which had previously given evidence to the House of Commons committee. In fact, to be more accurate, 19 of those witnesses were major national organizations, some of whom supported the bill and some of whom wanted amendments made to the bill. However, in our committee we heard those people again giving virtually the same information and being asked, I presume, fresh questions.

In the legislative committee of the House of Commons 46 groups and 98 individuals were heard. The total time spent on the bill was 32 hours in the House of Commons and 87 hours of legislative committee hearings.

We have spent adequate time today in the Senate on Bill C-22. As I have said before, it is virtually a Committee of the Whole, and perhaps we do not need the Special Committee if we are going to do it all in this house. However, in the Senate committee we have spent over 80 hours hearing witnesses, separate from the discussion that has been held on second reading. I plead again that if we are to debate all of this in the Senate and also in committee, one of the two areas of discussion be eliminated. I am not against full and total discussion, but at the right time and at the right place.

• (1620)

I want to point out a discourtesy which I have noticed—and, Lord knows, we have been, back and forth, somewhat less than courteous to each other. In the last few days we have been anxious to find out what the urgency of passing this bill is. It has been pointed out to us that the minister in charge of this bill has been made available to us repeatedly to come and talk to our committee, yet, we seem to have rebuffed him. Today was the—what shall I say—epitome of discourtesy, as we had the minister waiting outside our committee room, where we were meeting in camera, like an anxious bride awaiting the nuptials, and we did not invite him in to hear us. I felt that the least we could have done was point out to him that we were still in committee and we would call him. But, then, when we did go out to see him to make our apologies to him, since he had waited for a considerable period of time—

Senator Guay: He was gone!

Senator Barootes: —the minister had left. I felt that that was unbecoming of us, as a Senate group and as a committee, not to have paid some courtesy to our minister, from whom we expect explanations.

Maybe I am too sensitive about this, as I am sensitive about other things that occur in this chamber, but I do not think that it is necessary for us to criticize the minister, and not even ask him for his opinion when he has made himself available—as Senator Murray pointed out a few days ago and again today—on five minutes' notice.

I understand that we may be seeing him at the close of the hearings today, and I think that that is right and proper if the committee meets after the Senate rises. Am I correct that we intend to have a meeting of the Special Committee now?

Senator Cogger: When the Senate rises.

Senator Barootes: I made some remarks earlier—

Hon. Charles McElman: Would you permit a question at this point to clear something up? Were you speaking of this morning that the minister was not heard, and he was in the hallway?

Senator Guay: Were you aware of it?

Senator McElman: Was it this morning that you were speaking of?

Senator Barootes: Yes, senator, I think he made himself available and was in the hallway, opposite Room 256, this morning awaiting—

Senator Guay: Were you aware of it yourself?

Senator Barootes: Yes.

Senator Guay: Why did you not tell the chairman?

Senator Phillips: I did.

Senator Barootes: The chairman was made aware of it.

Senator Guay: If you were aware of it, why did not you tell the chairman so that he might invite him in?

Senator Barootes: Thank you, Senator Guay. I think that we mentioned it in the committee, but by the time the committee or Senator Bonnell suggested that we ask him in it was just past noon, and he had left by then.

Senator McElman: Are you not aware that the committee was not advised that the minister was there—

Senator Guay: That's right!

Senator McElman: —and that as quickly as it was known that he was there, Senator Buckwold immediately advised the chairman that he was there and suggested that he be asked in. The committee agreed and someone went to bring him in, but he had held his press conference in the hallway and left.

Senator Guay: Right on!

Senator Frith: That is what happened. You are away off base on this one!

Senator Barootes: Senator McElman, I accept that explanation.

Senator Frith: It is not an explanation; that is what happened.

Senator Barootes: Those are the facts, as you say, but I say that he was in the hall. I do not know whether he waited half an hour, an hour or 20 minutes, but he thought that he was going to be called in—

Senator Frith: So, who are you blaming?

Senator Guay: Why did you not call him in?

Senator Barootes: —and he was not called in. I am not blaming anyone in particular, but I am saying that it was a discourtesy on our part.

Senator Frith: Well, then, why are you bringing it up? How can it be a discourtesy if no one knows that he is there? That is ridiculous!

Senator Cogger: Well, he is waiting right now.

An Hon. Senator: Had he been invited?

Hon. Joseph-Philippe Guay: Honourable senators, I feel that if the minister wanted to be heard, the least that he could have done—speaking about his executive assistant or secretaries, as you mentioned a while ago—he could have let it be known to the committee, which was getting together this morning on an organization matter. Why, then, did he not let it be known to you or to the committee immediately when he got there instead of holding a press conference in front of the door, and, as soon as he was through, walking away? Had he let it be known to the chairman or to someone in there, surely to goodness, as soon as he had arrived there, he would have been invited in.

Senator Frith: He was invited in as soon as they knew.

Senator Petten: As soon as they knew.

Senator Guay: Well, he was invited, I am told now, but he had already left.

Senator Marshall: I understand that he is waiting now. Let us adjourn the debate.

Senator Barootes: The fact is that he was not invited in, whether we knew or not.

Senator Frith: What is discourteous in that?

Some Hon. Senators: Oh, oh!

Senator Barootes: I did not expect his legislative assistant to come barging into the room and say, "The minister awaiteth without."

Senator Guay: May I let it be known to you that one of his assistants or one of his executive assistants could have easily let that message be known to the committee as a whole and the chairman thereof. That is the proper procedure for a minister, to let it be known when he wants to be heard. I happen to know, because I went through that and I know what it is like. Had a minister let it be known to any committee that he wanted to be heard then I am sure that he would have been heard—but he left immediately after holding his press conference.

Senator Barootes: He had made it known that he was available to our committee on several occasions, and we have not invited him.

Senator Guay: But not with authority.

Senator McElman: But not by standing in a hallway holding a press conference.

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I want to add a few words regarding the matter of legislative assistants or secretaries from ministers' offices, or whatever you call them, travelling with Senate committees.

I do not know the circumstances in this particular case, but I do know that in the past there have been offers on a number of occasions that this should happen. I think that it is a bad practice. Committees of the Senate are committees of the Senate, not committees of the government.

Senator Guay: Right on!

Senator Molgat: I believe that there should be no members of ministers' staffs attached to Senate committees. We have had that problem previously, for example, with the Joint Committee of the Senate and House of Commons on Senate Reform—and it was with a previous government and a previous Prime Minister. The Prime Minister's Office and the PCO offered us an individual who would travel with the committee. The committee considered it and decided, "No, we are not an organism of the Privy Council Office or the Prime Minister's Office, we are a Senate committee—" in this case, a joint committee—"and we do not want any kind of impression that we are under the thumb of anyone or directed by anyone."

Senator Guay: Right on!

Senator Molgat: Senator Marshall will recall that the Standing Senate Committee on Fisheries had a problem in this regard, where an individual from an organization close to government travelled with us, and it caused us difficulties. I think it should be a standard practice that Senate committees do not have attached to them personnel from ministers' offices, under any circumstances.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. L. Norbert Thériault: Honourable senators, I am grateful to Senator Molgat for pointing this out, because during that three or four week period that we travelled on the committee on Bill C-22 I must honestly tell my colleagues that I was embarrassed that we did not make a move in any place without the minister's staff, who oftentimes were travelling in conjunction with PR men for PMAC, passing out press clippings and press releases to the media, often before our meetings started, and procuring answers from and asking questions of the government members of the committee. On many occasions I was tempted to raise it as a point of order. I am sorry now that I did not, because I agree strongly with Senator Molgat. When a Senate committee is doing a job travelling and meeting throughout the country, it is not a government committee and it is no place for a member of the minister's staff to be.

On motion of Senator Flynn, debate adjourned.

SECOND REPORT OF COMMITTEE ADOPTED

The Senate proceeded to consideration of the second report of the Special Committee of the Senate on the Subject Matter of Bill C-22, to amend the Patent Act and to provide for certain matters in relation thereto, presented in the Senate on June 16, 1987.

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, I could get up and counter-debate all of the points brought forth, and do other things such as telling my good friend, Senator Flynn, where he is wrong again, but there is no sense telling him that, because it does not seem to go past the first layer of the epidermis. Consequently, I will just discuss the second report.

• (1630)

Honourable senators, the second report of the Special Committee on Bill C-22 was presented on June 16, 1987. Because of the constraints in regard to the timetable, and due to the fact that we were a week late in commencing our hearings, we had to ask the witnesses from the Yukon to come to Victoria and the witnesses from Yellowknife to come to Edmonton. They accepted the invitation and that saved our committee the travelling expenses of going to Whitehorse and Yellowknife as well as the accommodation expenses which would have been incurred in those two cities. That allowed us to return to Ottawa quickly in order to present our report to the Senate on Tuesday, June 16, as was the original plan.

While in Fredericton, New Brunswick, the Minister of Health was unable to attend because she had to attend a cabinet meeting. However, since that time she has sent us a brief, on behalf of the people of New Brunswick, opposing the bill.

On June 2, 1987, we were in Victoria, British Columbia, where the Minister of Health and Human Resources of the Government of the Yukon, the Hon. Margaret Joe, representing the people of the Yukon, appeared as a witness and opposed the bill. Also, while in Victoria, the Minister of Inter-Governmental Affairs of British Columbia did not appear as a witness but has since sent a letter, on behalf of himself and the Minister of Health of British Columbia, opposing the bill.

On June 10, in Toronto, Ontario, the committee heard from the Assistant Deputy Minister for Emergency and Specialized Health Services, Dr. Dennis Psutka, who spoke on behalf of the people of Ontario, opposing the bill.

No representatives or ministers of provincial or territorial governments appeared to support the bill.

I thought I should report these facts for the record.

At this time I would like to thank the members who worked so hard on the committee during the last month, namely, Senators Barootes, Buckwold, Cogger, David, Marchand, Thériault and Turner as well as Senators Doody and Frith. I should also like to include other senators such as Senators Petten, Gigantès, Marsden, Bazin, Lucier, Corbin, Simard, Perrault, Nurgitz, Steuart and Hébert who filled in from time to time.

At this time I would like to thank the staff, who worked hard under difficult circumstances, namely, Mr. André Reny, who was the clerk of the committee, and Mr. Denis Bouffard, who acted as committee clerk while travelling. I would also like to express thanks to my research officers, Marion Wrobel and Margaret Smith; secretary, Hélène Bouchard, co-ordinator, Larry Gendron; and messenger, Jacqueline Lambert. Without the help of this staff, it would have been impossible to carry out this tremendous task in such a short period of time. Everything was booked in advance and there were no hold-ups, and witnesses were all given an opportunity to be heard.

Let me say, in closing the debate on this report, that the Senate committee was received well in all the provinces. Most of the witnesses were pleased to know that we had come to their province to hear their views concerning Bill C-22, and most of the witnesses were looking forward to seeing the Senate carrying out its role of giving sober second thought to legislation passed by the lower house, especially at a time when one party holds as many seats as it does and controls the lower house at this particular time in our history. It was felt by many that it was at times like this that the Senate, representing regions of the country, should represent the balance of power as well as representing the country regionally so that those areas with large populations cannot control the destiny of the country as a whole.

With those remarks, honourable senators, I move the adoption of the second report.

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, just before we go to the next order, I should like to mention that although the committee has had some appreciation expressed to it by the chairman of the committee, I would like to extend appreciation to the chairman.

In spite of some of the things that have been said, his really was an example of excellent chairmanship of an important Senate committee. We are appreciative of the leadership he provided, and we wish him very well in the continuing deliberations of the committee, and express our thanks for what he did.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Motion agreed to and report adopted.

The Senate adjourned until Monday, August 10, 1987, at 2 p.m.

THE SENATE

Monday, August 10, 1987

The Senate met at 2 p.m., the Speaker in the Chair.

Prayers.

THE HONOURABLE ALLAN J. MacEACHEN, P.C.

TRIBUTE ON THIRTY-FOURTH ANNIVERSARY OF ELECTION TO PARLIAMENT

Hon. Henry D. Hicks: Honourable senators, before we proceed with the business of the day, may I point out that it was exactly 34 years ago, on August 10, 1953, that the now Leader of the Opposition in the Senate was first elected to the House of Commons and began a career of public service to the people of Canada, and particularly to the people of Nova Scotia—and even more particularly to the people of Cape Breton Island—which I believe has been unexcelled in the annals of our history.

I am sure we all congratulate him on having survived so long and done so much.

Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

PATENT ACT

BILL TO AMEND—REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE PRESENTED AND PRINTED AS APPENDIX

Hon. M. Lorne Bonnell: Honourable senators, thank you for that applause. After hearing my report some of you might not wish to applaud quite so loudly.

Hon. C. William Doody (Deputy Leader of the Government): That was applause that was left over for Senator MacEachen!

Senator Bonnell: I see. Honourable senators, the Special Committee of the Senate on Bill C-22 has the honour to present its Sixth Report respecting Bill C-22, to amend the Patent Act and to provide for certain matters in relation thereto, with amendments, observations, recommendations and recognition of dissenting opinion.

I ask that the report be printed as an appendix to the Debates of the Senate and the Minutes of the Proceedings of the Senate of this day and form part of the permanent records of this house.

The Hon. the Speaker: Is it agreed, honourable senators?

Hon. Senators: Agreed.

(For text of report, see appendix, p. 1652.)

The Hon. the Speaker: Honourable senators, when shall this report be taken into consideration?

On motion of Senator Bonnell, report placed on the Orders of the Day for consideration at the next sitting of the Senate.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION BILL, 1987

REPORT OF COMMITTEE PRESENTED

Hon. Léopold Langlois, Chairman of the Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications, presented the following report:

Monday, August 10, 1987

The Standing Senate Committee on Transport and Communications has the honour to present its

EIGHTH REPORT

Your Committee, to which was referred Bill C-18, An Act respecting national transportation, has, in obedience to the Order of Reference of Monday, June 29, 1987, examined the said Bill and now reports the same with ten amendments:

1. Page 2, clause 3: In the French version, strike out lines 30 to 36 and substitute the following:

QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CANADA-UNITED STATES RELATIONS

TRADE—REDUCTION OF CANADIAN URANIUM EXPORTS TO UNITED STATES—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Sidney L. Buckwold: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. We in Saskatchewan seem to be going from one problem to another in our trade relationship with the United States. You will recall that I previously asked a question with respect to problems facing the Canadian potash industry to which I received some non-committal replies. Now our province is faced with the possibility of a substantial reduction in exports of uranium to the United States.

Uranium is a major Saskatchewan mineral and is produced in large quantities. Saskatchewan produces uranium of probably the highest quality in the world. It is an industry that has meant a great deal to our province. However, in the past few years the industry has been the victim of falling prices. In 1979, I believe, the price of uranium was almost three times what it is today.

The United States, seeking some means of keeping alive their own uranium industry, has, through court rulings, indicated that it is quite possible that uranium imports to the United States—mostly from Saskatchewan—will be reduced from approximately two-thirds of their requirement to approximately one-third. This would constitute a serious setback to an already endangered industry in Saskatchewan. I understand this decision may be further appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

My question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate is: What is the federal government doing to protect the interests of Saskatchewan in this situation? I have previously asked this question with respect to the potash industry and some other problems with which we have been faced in our province. I am well aware of the new program to promote western initiatives and the so-called $1 billion that will be available. However, that has nothing to do with this situation. This is a very serious problem, and I suppose what makes it all the more difficult to understand is that at the very time when we are talking about the so-called level playing field and a free trade arrangement with the United States, almost monthly a new punch is thrown at Saskatchewan industry by our friends in the United States.

AGRICULTURE

GRAIN—1987 CROP YEAR—DECLINE IN PRICES—GOVERNMENT RELIEF MEASURES

Hon. H.A. Olson: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate with respect to the lower prices farmers are to receive for the 1987 grain crop. I know that the government made an announcement some time ago that they intended to reduce the prices substantially. In fact, that reduction took effect on August 1, which is the beginning of the new crop year. At that time the initial price of wheat was reduced by 18 per cent, and for some grades of barley the price was reduced by 27 per cent.

Honourable senators, just to put this matter into perspective, this means that now, in 1987, farmers in western Canada will be receiving 40 per cent of what they got for wheat ten years ago. What makes it even worse is that that 40 per cent is in 1987 dollars vis-à-vis the value of a 1977 dollar. In other words, in 1977 wheat was selling for approximately $6 total. This year, with these reductions, optimistically the farmers can expect $2.50 per bushel for that same quality wheat.

Therefore, I am asking the Leader of the Government in the Senate if the government is giving consideration, on an urgent basis, to giving some relief from the economic and financial consequences of this disastrous decline in price.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, again, I will ask for a report from the Minister of Agriculture.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, I can understand that the minister would take it as notice, and I would expect him to say so inasmuch as it might concern specific details. However, surely he can answer today on the principle as to whether or not the government is giving urgent consideration to some relief from this problem that I mentioned. Surely the subject is important enough that he would be aware of it without making inquiries of other ministers.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, my honourable friend speaks of relief from this problem. The whole range of government policies directed at agriculture, stabilizing the Canadian economy and bringing down interest rates, and so forth, can be said to be successful in bringing some relief to the problems of primary producers in the prairie provinces and elsewhere.

The honourable senator is asking whether there is going to be a specific new income-support program brought in at this time. I can only tell him that if and when there are announcements to be made in that regard, they will be made by the appropriate minister. Meanwhile, I will see what further information, if any, can be obtained from the Minister of Agriculture on the matter that he has raised.

Senator Olson: I have a supplementary question. Honourable senators, can we not give any hope to the farmers of western Canada that the government is giving some consideration to this? We know that the provincial premiers have had a meeting. They had that important meeting in Humboldt, Saskatchewan, I believe it was, and that is now several weeks behind us. They have called this situation urgent and have expressed their views on what ought to be done.

Surely the minister can give us a little hope that they are at least considering the seriousness of this situation insofar as western grain producers are concerned. Can he give some hope?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the record of this government with regard to western agriculture is the best indication of our future course. The farmers know that and are very happy to know it.

Senator Olson: Honourable senators, the farmers may know that. They know that they are suffering the worst economic conditions in the last 50 years under this government. If that is the record they are to look at and take some hope from, I can tell him that he will find out what they think of that kind of prospect.

ABORIGINAL PEOPLES

INUIT OF WESTERN ARCTIC LAND CLAIMS SETTLEMENT— REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION OF DISBURSEMENT OF FUNDS

Hon. D.G. Steuart: Honourable senators, I would like to direct a question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. This question is with regard to the land claim settlement arrived at some three years ago by the Government of Canada and the Inuit of the western Arctic. That group was and is still known as COPE—Committee of Original People's Entitlement. It was some three years ago that the government made the settlement, and that settlement was backed up, as you probably remember, by legislation passed by the House of Commons and the Senate.

Approximately a year before the settlement was made, I had been the chief negotiator for the government on this land claim. Due to a very sharp difference of opinion between myself and some of the people negotiating for COPE, mainly a non-native individual whose name is Bob DeLury, I resigned from the position. I was replaced by Simon Reisman, and he finished up the negotiation. I question whether it was successful or not, but he did finish it.

The most serious difference of opinion between myself and those working for the native people was on the question of accountability. I wanted a clause in the agreement and a clause in the legislation that would insist that the government, from time to time, hold those people accountable for the huge sums of money that they were granted by the government in settlement of this claim. The amount of money we are talking about is over $150 million spread over a period of years. The amount of land was over 37,000 square kilometres, and there were a great many other concessions given in response to the COPE claim. Nevertheless, I think it was a very fair claim and a good settlement for the some 25,000 Inuit people.

As part of the deal that was made, a very complicated system of holding corporations was set up to handle this money. Since then I have been informed that Mr. DeLury and some of the other people are still, you could say, running COPE. They are in charge of the disbursement of this money and what is done with it.

● (1420)

I have recently received complaints from the Inuit community, from the former mayor of Tuktoyaktuk, Vince Steen, from the current mayor and from others who hold positions of responsibility in various communities located in the western Arctic. The complaints are that they have received little or no reports on the spending of that money, or that the reports they have received are meaningless. There have been complaints of conflict of interest in that when COPE representatives hired consultants from southern Canada—in fact, from southern Alberta—those consultants recommended that COPE buy into oil wells that, as it turned out, the consultants held major shares in. COPE has also complained that some of the money has been invested in Jamaica, or in some other place in the West Indies.

The "Fifth Estate" television program recently examined the COPE claim. That program raised many serious questions; however, it did not answer any.

I should like the Leader of the Government in the Senate to ask the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to conduct an investigation into this matter.

I have made preliminary inquiries. The answers I have been given are that this was part of the deal, that the money was handed over, and that the Inuit are to be independent of government. That is all very well and sounds very well, but, personally, I think it is a cop out by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

COPE now has control of almost $100 million that has been granted to the members of that organization, and it has also borrowed against the final settlement. That is a huge sum of money. While the government of the day is not responsible for the deal that was made, and is not responsible for the fact that there is no accountability clause in the agreement or in the final legislation—I admit that that was arrived at by the former Liberal government—if this blows up, and if, in fact, there has been mishandling and misuse of this money, then the Inuit community will suffer, as will all Canadian taxpayers.

I think the government does have an ongoing responsibility to look into these complaints. I ask the leader to request an investigation and to provide an answer as quickly as possible.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I will convey my friend's representations to my colleague, Mr. McKnight, and report back in due course.

POST-SECONDARY EDUCATION—INADEQUACY OF STUDENT ASSISTANCE PROGRAMS

Hon. Len Marchand: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. While he is visiting with his colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, on the matter raised by my friend, Senator Steuart, perhaps the leader could consult with the minister on the disastrous education policy that was announced last May. Honourable senators will recall that I raised this matter then and expressed grave concern about what that policy would mean for Indian students this fall.

Just to refresh honourable senators' memories, at that time the minister set out categories for funding. The priority category for funding this fall is that those who were funded last year will receive funding again this fall, those who did not receive funds last year and who apply for funding this year will receive funding, and the rest will receive what is left.

That means that students who graduated last June will not receive funds for any form of post-secondary education this year.

In my home band alone, which consists of 900 to 1,000 members, there are 26 students who will not receive funding for post-secondary education this fall. From talking with members of other bands around the country, I have learned that there are literally going to be hundreds, or a few thousand, of students who will not be able to pursue post-secondary education this fall. I call this a disastrous policy.

Such progress as our people, the Métis, the Indian and the Inuit, have made over the past 20 years has been, by and large, related to education. It makes good sense; these people become taxpayers. Maybe you could also tell the minister that once these people get educated they go to work, largely outside the reservation communities, and the taxpayers get back their money within a few years from these students who are leading productive lives.

This policy that he has in place—I do not want to use rhetoric; it is the truth of what is happening in those communities—means that those students will be relegated to welfare and unemployment in those communities. If the minister wants some information, I can take him around and show him some of those communities where there is 50, 60, 70 and even up to 90 per cent unemployment right now. Their way out to a better future is through education.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I recall that Senator Marchand brought these matters to our attention earlier in this session, and I believe that I brought in a report from Mr. McKnight at that time. I do not know how or why he can describe the policy as a disaster when there has been such an enormous increase in the amount of money spent by the government in this field and, as he himself acknowledges, I believe, an enormous increase in the number of students who are being educated under the program.

Financial resources are not unlimited, however, and it was necessary for the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to establish some priorities in this field. If he believes that the priorities are unfair or inequitable, or are being inequitably applied, then we could look at that.

In any case, I will speak to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, as the honourable senator suggests, and see what further information, if any, I can bring in. Meanwhile, the honourable senator might wish to put a notice of inquiry forward and debate the matter. I will undertake to have somebody reply in a more comprehensive fashion than is possible in the oral Question Period.

Senator Marchand: Honourable senators, I want to say to the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations—and I appreciated his bringing back that report from the minister when I raised this question before—that all the answer did was reiterate the minister's policy. He did not make any changes or reply in any substantive way as to why he was doing what he was doing.

I understand that we have been spending substantial amounts of money. That is the way it has to be. That is the only way out. It will cost money. If he is telling me that he does not want to educate the students, that is another thing, but that is what is happening. I will bet you that most of the students who graduated last year from high school will not be able to go on to any kind of post-secondary education this fall, if my home band is any kind of example of what is going on in other parts of the country.

I have not been able to make many calls, but I have made a number of calls to inquire about this. There is a national meeting going on at the Alexander Band north of Edmonton on August 17, 18 and 19, and there is also a rally in Edmonton on August 16 concerning this matter. Indians from all across the country, including the Northwest Territories—which include the Inuit—are coming to that rally. The rally is related to the lack of funding for those kids who want to go to school this fall.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, surely the honourable senator does not seriously suggest that the government does not want to educate native peoples. The facts are there. The moneys that have been committed to this, and the numbers who have taken advantage of it, speak for themselves. The honourable senator is not satisfied with the minister's explanation of his policy. It is obvious, then, that some further explanation is in order, and I invite the honourable senator, as I did earlier, to put down a notice of inquiry and we will have a fuller discussion of the matter.

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD, 1987—CLAUSE 16—STATUS OF WOMEN—GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Lorna Marsden: Honourable senators, on July 30 last the Leader of the Government in the Senate met with representatives of the National Association of Women and the Law, the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund, and the ad hoc Committee of Women on the Canadian Constitution concerning their reservations about clause 16 of the constitutional amendments now being discussed. They subsequently made their representations before the joint committee.

My question concerns the remarks made by a member of the government party—I believe, the chairman of the Conservative caucus in the other place. It has been reported in the press that he said that something will have to be changed in the accord to accommodate the concerns which were raised by women, the concerns which were also put before the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I wonder if the member of Parliament is expressing the opinion of the government.

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): No, honourable senators. We will be content to hear all of the evidence before the joint committee, to receive the committee's report in due course and to discuss it.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, as the Leader of the Government in the Senate is aware, there is movement, as there was in previous constitutional amendments, to organize the women of the country around these concerns which appear to have been ignored by all the First Ministers in that report.

Is the Leader of the Government in the Senate then saying that that political organization needs to take place before there will be any assurance that our hard-won equality rights will be kept in the current constitutional amendments?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, as my friend has noted, together with my colleague, Mrs. McDougall, I met with the representatives of those women's organizations. They made representations to us which they later repeated in greater detail before the joint committee.

They have not produced a legal opinion, as such. On the other hand, the government has legal opinions from other witnesses who appeared before the committee to the effect that the concerns expressed are unfounded.

Without prejudging the case, I repeat that we will be content to wait to hear the rest of the evidence before the committee and to see what the committee reports.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, is the leader then saying that his colleague—I believe, Mr. Daubney—is wrong, or that he has been misquoted as having said that he believed something would have to change in the agreement to satisfy the concerns of women?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the last time I looked, Mr. Daubney was not a member of the government.

Senator Marsden: Honourable senators, I meant to say, “a member of the government party.” I apologize.

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I would not tax my honourable friend with all of the views of all of her caucus colleagues, and I hope she will not tax me with all the views of mine.

Some Hon. Senators: Hear, hear!

REFUGEES

DISPOSITION OF SHIP USED FOR TRANSPORTATION

Hon. Paul Lucier: Honourable senators, my question is for the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I should like to know the status of the ship that brought the 174 refugees to this country. It is my understanding that the ship is presently located in Halifax.

I know that the Leader of the Government will not have this information available to him right now, but I should like to know where the ship is presently and what will be its disposition. Will it be seized and sold and the money turned over to the Crown, or will it be released back to the owners? What will happen to that ship?

THE CONSTITUTION

CONSTITUTIONAL ACCORD, 1987—CLAUSE 16—STATUS OF WOMEN—AVAILABILITY OF LEGAL OPINIONS

Hon. Joyce Fairbairn: Honourable senators, I have a question for the Leader of the Government in the Senate which is supplementary to that asked by my friend, Senator Marsden.

The Leader of the Government made mention of legal opinions which, in his mind, indicate that women's rights would not be abridged in any way by the passage of the accord. Were those opinions made public at any time? Will they be shared with the members of the committee and with the rest of us?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I was referring to opinions, to statements on the matter made before the joint committee by various witnesses from outside government and by the Deputy Minister of Justice of Canada. Of course, members of the committee will have an opportunity to ask questions on this matter of the witnesses who will be appearing over the next two or three weeks. Some of these witnesses are very eminent constitutional lawyers, others represent interest groups, others are eminent public servants, while still others are former public servants and former politicians. I think we should wait to obtain the evidence from all of these people, in particular from the constitutional experts, before jumping to any conclusions on the matter.

I may add that in due course the Committee of the Whole of the Senate will have the opportunity to hear from law officers of the Crown when I appear and from other witnesses that the committee may wish to invite.

NATIONAL PARKS

PAYMENT TO PROVINCES FOR LAND TO ESTABLISH PARKS—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. Gildas L. Molgat: Honourable senators, I direct my question to the Leader of the Government in the Senate. I think many, if not most, Canadians were pleased to learn recently that the South Moresby region of the Queen Charlottes will be preserved as a national park. However, we noted as well that in order for that to happen the federal government will apparently pay something of the order of $100 million to the Province of British Columbia.

It is my understanding that in the past the policy regarding national parks was that the provinces were to assemble the land and turn it over to the federal government at no cost. I believe that procedure has previously been followed in connection with the national parks across the country. Does the South Moresby park, then, mark the beginning of a change in the policy of the federal government? Will the federal government henceforth be paying provinces for land assembled for national parks?

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Honourable senators, I had before me a few weeks ago a detailed breakdown of the federal government's offer to British Columbia on this matter, which breakdown indicated that the offer was worth something like $106 million. I think I should retrieve that information and place it on the record for the benefit of my honourable friend.

Senator Molgat: Honourable senators, I would certainly appreciate getting that information, but the minister has not answered my question on whether it is now government policy to pay provinces for the land that will become national parks. What is going to happen henceforth with other provinces? I understand that negotiations are going on with Saskatchewan, for example, for a park in the southern region of that province. Discussions were under way some years ago in my own province of Manitoba for a park to be established in a region along Lake Winnipeg and the border of Ontario. What is the policy going to be? Can we expect that the federal government will pay us for that land?

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, I am aware of the policy as the honourable senator describes it. How strictly it has been adhered to in the past I am not certain, nor am I certain of how valid his premise is. That is why I have not attempted to answer the question. Once I have satisfied myself on those scores I will address the question.

Senator Molgat: I look forward with pleasure to the answer.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

GOVERNMENT INTENTION RE LEGISLATION TO ESTABLISH—MECHANISM TO MONITOR DEPARTMENTAL ACTIVITIES—APPOINTMENT AND COMPOSITION OF BOARD—CRITERIA FOR ACCESS TO PROGRAMS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Leader of the Opposition): Honourable senators, I ask the Leader of the Government whether it is the intention to bring in legislation at any point with respect to the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

● (1440)

Hon. Lowell Murray (Leader of the Government and Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations): Yes, honourable senators, it is our intention to do that in the fall.

Senator MacEachen: The material that was put out at the time of the announcement stated that there was to be established a coordinating mechanism to monitor or coordinate the activities of all departments with respect to Atlantic opportunities. I wonder whether that mechanism has been established, and, if so, what it is.

There was also reference made to the appointment of a board, and I am wondering whether that board has been appointed. Is it to be made up of public servants or private sector people?

Finally, there is another point which has to do with the criteria of eligibility. Have any criteria been established to guide those who wish to make submissions to the agency for assistance?

[Senator Murray.]

Senator Murray: Honourable senators, the Leader of the Opposition will be aware that a number of existing programs—such as the Atlantic Enterprise Program; Enterprise Cape Breton; IRDP grants and loans up to a certain ceiling; the Small Businesses Loans Act, as it affects the Atlantic provinces, the ERDA subagreements which had been administered by DRIE, have been brought under the wing of the agency, and we have been concentrating, in the opening weeks, on attempting to so organize those programs that they will be of maximum effectiveness in the region.

In particular, we have been attempting, I believe with some success, to cut some of the red tape and some of the process so that clients who are applying for assistance under those programs will be able to do so and will be able to obtain assistance promptly.

With regard to the coordinating mechanism in Ottawa, so far I am it; but as time goes on I expect to be able to put in place a group of public servants here who will assist me in carrying out that part of my ministerial mandate and the mandate of the agency.

The board will ultimately be appointed officially by order in council after the legislation has been passed. Meanwhile, it is my intention to appoint the board as a transitional board under ministerial authority, and I hope to have appointed most of them by the end of this week.

I believe that answers all of the Leader of the Opposition's questions.

Senator MacEachen: Honourable senators, the answer given by the Leader of the Government suggests one other question. He said that he expected to complete the appointment process this week. Have any members of the board been appointed up to the present, and, if so, who are they?

Senator Murray: The president and chief executive officer has, of course, been appointed. That is Mr. McPhail. I expect to appoint most of the others in the course of this week.
